NOTICE OF FINAL PROOF.

Land Office at St. Cloud, Minn., November 2nd, 1892.

Notice is hereby given that the following named settler has filed notice of his intention to make final proof in support of his claim, and that said proof will be made before S. P. Alderman, Clerk of the District Court, at Brainerd, Minn., on Saturday, Dec. 10th, 1892, viz:

CHARLES J. RYALQUIST,

H. E. No. 12326 for the NW¼ of NE¼ Sec. 34, Twp. 45, Range 29.

He names the following witnesses to prove his continuous residence upon and cultivation of said land, viz:

Ewald Paulson, Peter H. S. Aspheim, John A. Jackson, Peter C. Sandberg, P. O. address of all Brainerd, Crow Wing County, Minn.

A. BARTO, Register.

THE plurality of Baldwin over Searle for congress was 265.

WM. E. LEE is far in the lead for the speakership of the next house.

IT is reported that Henry Fogg the Republican candidate for congress in the 5th district, has found sufficient errors to warrant a recount of the congressional vote in this district and will demand a recount.

Duluth republicans may be the gainers two years from now by the defeat of Judge Searle this year, but there are ways by which there hopes would be blasted. It is good policy not to develop them too soon, as the Republicans of this district need a few weeks for thoughtful meditation undisturbed by predictions as to the advantages the majority party in the great republican city will obtain for giving a democratic candidate for congress a majority. Let us wait just a week or two before giving Duluth republicans all the great Sixth district has to offer.—Transcript.

Is This True?

There is a rumor on foot to the effect that the land office will be removed from St. Cloud to Brainerd, and that Editor Stivers will be made receiver. It is only a rumor and can be accepted with a grain of salt.—Wadena Pioneer.

We take this opportunity of congratulating Bro. Strivers and trust that the rumor may prove true.

The official canvass.

The canvas of the votes for representatives in the 46 senatorial district will be made at the county auditor's office in Little Falls on Monday next, Nov 28—twenty days after the date of election. The canvassing board consists of the county auditors of each of the counties in the district (Morrison, Todd, Mille-Lacs and Crow Wing) and the chairman of the board of county commissioners of the oldest organized county. There is no prospect of contention over the count, as all the Republicans have safe majorities over the highest Democrat.—Transcript

The City Council.

The council met in special session last Friday evening. The city engineer was authorized to contract for connecting catch basins, where paving is being done, with the sewer. The council then adjourned.

The council met in regular session last Monday evening. All present but Alderman Ferris. The president appointed the following standing committees:

Finance and Taxes — McMurtry, Ferris, Johnson and Parker.

Streets, Sidewalks and Bridges—Sanborn, Anderson, Paine and Lowe.

Department of Water Works—Fogelstrom, Ferris, Parker and Sanborn.

Purchasing, Printing and City Property—Ferris, Paine, Parker and Johnson.

Electric Lights—Johnson, Fogelstrom, Lowe and Anderson.

Health, Sewerage and Police—Paine, Johnson, Fogelstrom and McMurtry.

Several bills were then allowed.

The bond of F. A. Farrar as city clerk in the sum of $2,000, and his bond as clerk of the municipal court in the sum of $1,000, were read and approved.

A motion was carried to request the mayor to enforce that portion of Ordinance No. 98 relating to the obstruction of the streets.

A motion was carried directing the electric light committee to make an investigation and report at the next meeting the cause of poor lights.

Sale of Brainerd School District Bonds.

Office of the Board of Education of the Brainerd School District,
WASHINGTON SCHOOL BUILDING, BRAINERD, MINN., Nov. 16, 1892.

Sealed bids will be received by the Board of Education of the Brainerd School District, at its office in the city of Brainerd, Crow Wing County, Minnesota, until 12 o'clock, noon, on the 5th day of January, A. D. 1893, for the purchase of the bonds of said Brainerd School District, in the aggregate sum of $50,000. Further description of said bonds, and of the conditions attending their sale, may be had upon application to the Clerk of said Board of Education.

The said Board reserves the right to reject any and all bids.

Attest: J. C. COSGROVE, President.
A. E. PENNELL, Clerk.

Teachers Institute.

I will hold a one day's teachers institute in the High School Building in Brainerd on Saturday Nov. 19 beginning at 9.30 A. M. I will discuss Arithmetic and Technical Grammar in the forenoon and Prof. Chasdie of the Brainerd City schools will speak on Language in the afternoon. I shall be glad to see a good attendance of the county teachers, and city teachers will be made very welcome.

The Old English Fiddler.

I know not why nor can I help regretting that the good old English word "fiddler" should have virtually lost caste, and dragged down fiddle with it in its fall. There's no blinking the fact that it has been a name of reproach for full a hundred years. Then, when poor Widow Thrale chose to give her dead brewer a successor in the person of the highly estimable Signor Piozzi, all the world and his wife cried shame upon her for "wedding a fiddler."

Hence we see that even in 1784 the word had already become what Jeremy Bentham calls a "question begging expellation"—and of hangdog force. But indeed the gallery was, "Don't waste him! Kill a fiddler with him!" addressed to the actor who had stage slain his man shows that "fiddler" had already taught to lose. But why? The old phrase, "Drunk as a fiddler," yields no explanation. It has its perfect match in the contemporary proverb, "Drunk as a lord," which never lowered the peerage in any one's esteem.

Nor can we fairly take as a type of his class the fiddler mentioned in Cowper's letters. That worthy, after fiddling all night at a tavern ball, begged a bed. All beds full, he craved a shake down in the hay loft, lured the guileless landlord thither, knocked him down and made off with all his cash. But even if we assume that the whole tenor of this exceptional fiddler's life was based only on, we'll assume it, thats fiat, and we leave it to sharper wits to find the key to this fiddle riddle.—National Review.

As an Ancient Legend.

Had ever a preacher of the inevitability of death, in any age or clime, a more poetic or striking presentation of the grim theme than in the following legend? Even ancient prophet to the modern worker in the life insurance vineyard none ever made a more vivid showing of the impotency of seeking to escape the dread messenger of omnipotence.

The story is of King Solomon, who figures largely in oriental tradition outside of Hebraic lore. It is told of him that, walking one day in a great city, accompanied by a friend, an awesome figure was perceived by them at the head of the street.

"Who is that," inquired the friend in terror.

Solomon looked and answered, "It is the angel of death."

Then the friend begged of Solomon, who had the power of instantaneous transportation, to send him at once to some faroff spot, and Solomon dispatched him in a moment to India, thousands of miles away.

The angel of death meanwhile approached Solomon and asked, "Who was that man with whom you were just talking?"

Solomon gave the name and the angel of death said, "Strange that he should have been here, for I am ordered to call for him tomorrow in Cashmere." —Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

An Odd Place for a Snake.

John T. Thomas, a prominent boss at the Northwest colliery at Simpson, had an experience a few days ago that is worthy of special mention from the fact that it is supposed to be unprecedented in the history of mining. He was engaged in eating his dinner in the seam located fully 700 feet from the mouth of the slope when he observed a long, slender object wriggling along the floor of the mine a short distance from him. Upon closer inspection it proved to be a garter snake such as is seen in the fields hereabouts frequently.

It was twenty-two inches in length, and was immediately killed by the men when Mr. Thomas had called to see this ordinary sight in such an extraordinary place. Mr. Thomas has followed the vocation of a miner in this country and Wales for thirty-seven years. In the latter country he has seen eels in the mines which had been hatched from spawn brought there by the flooding of the underground works, but he has yet to hear of a similar case of snake finding.—Carbondale (Pa.) Leader.

A Singular Proceeding.

An instance of an interested jury-man was reported not long ago. A jury had been empaneled, then a man stepped forward and explained that, having been summoned to serve on a jury, he was allowed to do so at once, as he had to attend a funeral at a distant place in the latter portion of the week.

A somewhat similar case happened to him in the jury box; the case was tried, and owing to this man's obstinacy a verdict of acquittal was secured. It was subsequently discovered that the man had never been summoned to serve at all, and that the prisoner was his friend.—London Tit-Bits.

Trading on the Prince of Wales' Name.

The royal highness was once on a visit to Lord Spencer's country seat in town hall, and a "Mascot" company was doing very poor business at the local opera house. Rumor was floated that the prince would patronize the performance on Friday night. A semblance of truth was given to the rumor by the manager ordering an awning to be erected on Wednesday. By Friday morning every seat had been booked, but of course no royalty arrived, never having intended to go.—London Morning.

Why One Book Was in Demand.

The Aberdeen library committee, in a note to a report, said that "a small devotional book entitled 'The Ten Match' was the only one for which by returned sixty-five times by readers, chiefly of the feminine sex," but it was thought that this was to be taken as a proof of the popular work, or of the exceptionally devotional character of the library readers. Rather it was to be followed some of the instances where, the substance of the book not realizing the hopes raised for the title, it was with quiet speed returned to the library."—Blackwood's Magazine.

Tennyson, who was a shy, reserved man, could never understand Robert Browning's love of society. He has been heard to remark that Browning would die in a white choker at a dinner party. The two poets died as they would have wished to die—Robert Browning in the grand Palazzo Rezzonico, with his son by his bedside, and Lord Tennyson in his loved Surrey home, surrounded by his loved ones.—London Star.

A Business at Which the Mechanics Called Knappers Are Very Expert.

There are in all twenty three different kinds of flint made, but it requires some ingenuity to stretch them out so far. For instance, to make up the list you have gray muskets and black muskets, where difference is not at all in the workmanship, but in the toughness quality of the flint. Setting aside minor kinds, the main classes of flint are for the common gun, the pocket and horse pistols, the musket, rifle and carbine.

From the narrow point of his flake the workman chips a diminutive flint for a pocket pistol, though not so many of these are required as of a larger size for horse pistols. But the flints most in request are the neat and well shaped ones used for rifles, and the biggest of all are required for carbines. There is also a continuous though not a very considerable demand for strike-a-lights, meant for the use of travelers and sportsmen who have had experience of damp matches.

As each of these has its own shape and size, which must be accurately reproduced, it will be seen that the knapper at the anvil has a big demanding both skill and judgment. Yet its execution has become so much of a habit with him that he takes and chips away as if by instinct. At every sharp pop down drops a gun flint, which he takes in his hand and lets the hammer play upon it till the sharp edges are blunted and the size made exactly what is required.

The speed at which he works may be inferred from the fact that each man calculates to turn out on an average 3,000 a day. In time of pressure a knapper has been known—by commencing very early in the morning and working to a late hour at night—to make 9,000. But that is deemed an extraordinary and prodigious day's work.

The employers as well as the men reckon that taking all the year round a third of that number represents the output of a man. This means about 12,000 a week, for it is an old custom in the trade to make Saturday and Monday holidays—the former is devoted to play and the latter is given up to tool sharpening. Knapping cannot be done unless the hammers are in perfect order, and it is said that the only smiths who can put them right are a few in the neighborhood of Brandon who have done the work from infancy, and take to a nicety the face and temper required.

It is very difficult to calculate the gross number of gun flints made annually, as the work is in more hands than one, but in all England there are certainly not thirty men who can shape a flint. Machines used to fluctuate very much, and in dull times some of the hands were obliged to seek employment elsewhere. From half a dozen to a dozen knappers have constant work, however, and while they do not make fewer than 4,000,000 annually they must be very busy at times. 6,000,000, Brandon is the chief, but not the only seat of the manufacture. Gun flints are still made in small quantities at Birmingham, for sample, and specimens are to be seen in the British museum.—Longman's Magazine.

Food Uncertainties.

Apart from the repulsiveness of anything in our food that even sometimes spoils the possibility of fingering and fiddling, think or the valuable time and materials wasted in spoiling an otherwise eatable piece of mess, fish or fowl by this misguided practice of overdressing. I have had the misfortune to be confronted with a dish of fillets of sole so utterly improved off the face of creation by the artist in vegetable colors that, to save my life, I could not have said what I was eating, and at dinner parties I find myself continually shying like a horse at some bright red thing, black striped green thing or spotted brown and magenta thing—each with a flavor and an equally incomprehensible name—which is handed to me upon a richly imbazoned edifice erected upon an exquisite alabaster sole fantastically decorated with a composite candle or mutton fat and flour.—Nineteenth Century.

The "school age" is a variable quantity in this country. In six of the States and Territories children are admitted to the public schools at the age of 4 years; in 19, at 5; in 20, at 6; in 3, at 7; and in 1 Texas at 8.

The Italian Ordnance Department is considering the purchase of a projectile which, when it bursts, will produce a luminous disc of 100,000-candle power. It would light up an enemy's camp with great brilliancy.

One of the latest applications of electricity to mining operations is seen in a land mine in Belgium. Each bucket arriving at the top of the shaft makes an electric contact, and a needle in the office indicates by a red line upon a revolving drum the number of buckets brought up.

Prince Bismarck's criticism of the American army because of its lack of officers shows him to be equally ignorant of the affairs on this side of the pond. In an emergency, Kentucky and Missouri could furnish generals and colonels enough to officer the armies of the world.

Experiments show the German rifle to be more powerful weapon in use in the European armies, while the Lebel rifle, used by the French in Dahomey, makes a very ragged wound. The new English magazine rifle seems to be the cruelest of the three, as its bullet smashes bones and tears flesh at a distance of 1,000 yards.

A paragraph to the effect that Mrs. Langtry is sailing over Southern summer seas in a $175,000 yacht is industriously going the rounds. A great many people had begun to cherish the hope that that rather romantic dinary person had tumbled into permanent obscurity.

It is now said that the duke of Connaught will probably be appointed to the governorship of Malta. Although he has particular reason for not wishing to go solar as India, he has no objection to leaving England, and would really like command in Malta, where he would be independent, yet within easy reach of home.

Paul B. Du Chaillu has some pretty good evidence to offer that he is not, in the strict sense of the term, a marrying man. He avers that during his wanderings in the African wilds he received 22,000 proposals of marriage, and rejected them all. For a seasoned traveling man, this is a pretty good record.

The good news from Carmaux, France, that the great strike of the French miners is not likely to be ended in a manner satisfactory to both sides. The committee of strikers have agreed to submit the matters under dispute to arbitration. If they had arbitrated before they struck, they would be a good many thousands of francs in pocket to-day.

The champion eater has been found in the person of a negro named Lyver, more at Goshen Pass, Va. Recently at a single meal he ate two large loaves of bread, fifteen biscuits, representation also, two pounds of bacon, a fried chicken whole, with bread dressing and gravy thereto, two enormous glasses of buttermilk, four good-sized potatoes, and a dish of cabbage, with a pan of corn bread in addition.

A Cartersville, Ga., man is thrown out of a curiosity in the shape of a walking stick. It is of buckeye wood and literally covered with inscriptions incident to the Harrison and Tyler campaign. It is said to contain a history of Harrison's life, a list of the members of his Cabinet, with cuts of a log cabin and surrounding grounds and names of numerous of Harrison's officials.

Sergius Witte, the new Russian minister of finance, had a Russian mother, but his father was a German. When a young man he was a clerk in the freight department of a railway in southwestern Russia. He was a person say that by his zeal and energy he raised himself with unusual rapidity to a directorship on the same railway. His business brought him into contact with Vyschnegradski, who detected his great capacity, and by his influence Witte was first introduced into political office.

The empress of Germany, who gave birth recently to her seventh child, is one of the youngest looking women of her age in Germany. Her color is excellent and her cheeks are as rosy as those of a peasant girl. Although not strictly beautiful she is a large, fine-looking woman, with an expressive face, large blue eyes and a slight nose and an extremely winsome smile. In the ordinary sense of the term she does not look aristocratic or majestic, but is an ideal example of the German woman and mother. Her majesty is now about 33 years old. She was a princess of Schleswig-Holstein, and is a niece of that princess who married Professor Esmarch of the University of Kiel. The professor was not ennobled until a few years ago, so that the German empress was the niece of a man bearing no title whatever. He was considered one of the handsomest men in Germany.

THE FIRST THANKSGIVING.

It Lasted a Week and Everybody Was Invited.

What do you think of a Thanksgiving feast spread out under the trees and lasting for a week? Yet this actually happened—the whole village gave the feast and every one was invited.

And even then they were not satisfied, so they sent and invited their nearest neighbors. They invited ninety of their neighbors, and as the village itself consisted of only about fifty people you can see how hospitable they were. If you could have seen this little village you would have thought its poor affair. It had only one little street of log huts facing one another, beginning in the forest and ending in the forest, yet near the sound of the great sea, and both sea and forest were dear to the villagers for upon them they depended greatly for food. From the sea they procured bass, lobsters, shellfish and other sea food, from the forest they brought venison, wild turkeys, and other game; and for both they were grateful, for there had been a time in the history of the village when both sea and forest had refused to fall, and during this period one half of the inhabitants had died and were laid in graves hollowed with the earth so that their enemies might not find out how weak they were. So you can see why they loved the sea and forest. Perhaps though, if you had asked them, they would have said that they loved the sea best, for they knew that its waters stretched away from their little forest home for thousands of miles till they dashed against the coasts of England, the home that they had left forever but which held for them still many things as dear to them as life, and so the ocean never seemed as strange to them as did the forest with its ten-fold unfamiliar sights and sounds and where the wolves howled through the long night hours, and their dark skins of enemies prowled both night and day.

But although the log huts with their windows of oiled paper might seem poor and mean to you and hardly to warrant the giving of such a feast, yet to the invited guests the villages seemed quite a grand affair. For the villagers, having no white neighbors nearer than New Amsterdam on the South or Port Royal on the north, but of which we are hundreds of miles away, had asked to their feast the red Indians who lived in the forest as they were their nearest neighbors, and to the Indians who lived in wigwams or slept on the bare ground Plymouth village in the autumn of 1621 seemed a fine place, and it could have pitied none of them to imagine what more could be required in the way of comfort or luxury. The special cause of the feast was the celebration of the first harvest. Ten months before this the pilgrims had landed on Plymouth knowing that hardship, danger, and death lay before them, and during the first months they had suffered as we can not now imagine. The bitter cold the fear of the Indians the sickness caused by exposure, lack of food, and the hardships of every kind had in the long winter seem like an endless torture. But it passed away at last and spring came. The earth grew green, the forest turned beautiful, the cold rain passed wild flowers, bees and birds yielded willingly to the labors of the husbandmen and promised a fair harvest, and perhaps best of all, there appeared one day in the village street an Indian who came armed neither with tomahawk, or arrow, but who held out his hands toward the villagers as if in benediction and uttered the word "Welcome."

This was Samoset, a messenger from the great Massasoit, a noble and generous chieftain, who from that time proved a sincere and enduring friend of the white, and so the following summer was one of great comfort to the colonists, brightened with the prospect of a good harvest, and cheered with the friendship of Massasoit.

In the autumn the harvest, consisting of twenty acres of corn and six of barley and peas, was gathered in, and then the Thanksgiving feast was proclaimed as an expression of thankfulness and joy. A few days later the governor sent four men out after game, and as successful were they that in one day they killed enough to serve the entire company for a week.

The guests, among whom were King Massasoit and Samoset, came to the feast himself being painted for the occasion in honor of the occasion. White, yellow and blue seemed favorite colors, Samoset himself being painted in brilliant red. The services began with a prayer of Thanksgiving, to which the attending Indians listened with no less reverence than their white brothers, for to them it seemed that the Great Spirit was the father of all and loved all his children equally. A great feast followed, and when this was finished there were military exercises and games, in which both the Pilgrims and their guests took part. Then it was that Captain Miles Standish and his troops performed such wonders with powder and shot that the Indians were greatly awed and thought that there must be some magic about it, while the red men themselves shot their arrows with such skill, threw their tomahawks with such unerring aim, they entered their games with such fierce earnestness that the whites were very glad that they had come as friends instead of foes. As for the children, they had hard work to decide whether Captain Miles Standish or Massasoit was the greater, while both seemed greater even than the Governor, to whom everyone bowed in respect.

The merry making lasted a week during which time some of the Indian guests went into the forest and returned with five deer, which they presented to the governor and Miles Standish as a token that they wished to contribute something to the feast, and after this great feasting and rejoicing the Indians went back to their forest homes and the Pilgrims began to fit up their little log houses more snugly, for the winter was coming on again.

This was the first Thanksgiving ever held in America. A similar festival was held many times during the colonial days, and from long the chief day of the year to the people of New England it has become at last a great national holiday. But no occasion has its meaning appeared so beautiful and significant as in that far-off time, when suffering yet fresh, and dangers and knowing full well that others were yet to come the Pilgrims and Indians joined hands with their dark brothers of the forest and proclaimed the faith that had led them at last to view their fierce battle for life in the new world.

TRAMPS AND BULL DOGS.

One Should Be Fed and Other Killed—Some Testimony.

I recall five days of March, 1891, when 15 different tramps were arraigned. To my surprise, nearly every one related a similar experience, and I was convinced that their stories were true. As a general thing the very poorest people, they said, cheerfully divided with them of their meager stores, and frequently invited them to sit at their tables and often treated them as guests. Persons who lived in comfortable and modest houses—set down turned them away without food, but at these places they were rarely invited indoors. But there was not one rich man in 50 who would give a tramp a meal, unless he had a big bull dog—and rich women and their servants invariably slammed the door in their faces. Several of them testified that they had been driven from the doors of rich men's houses with the statement that they had been questioned as to the reasons assigned for a refusal to support them with food, and that the invariable reason was that they could not afford it.

The tramps told on different occasions, without collusion, in a modest and respectful manner, with the utmost confidence that they had anybody, with no reproaches for any unkindness, and with grateful acknowledgments for kindnesses, which impressed me as the words of sobered truth.

I have often wondered if after all it isn't easier work to feed a tramp occasionally than to keep yourself throwing him over the fence or pursuing him with a club; and wouldn't it be cheaper to feed an occasional tramp than a continual bulldog, or to pay policemen, judges and juries for arresting, sentencing and feeding him.—Police Justice S. R. Davis in N. Y. Advertiser.

In most cases a runaway was not pursued, for there was a common saying amongst the officers "if an Indian escapes, let him go, when a man had got away, that Satan would bring back his accomplices," which meant that owing to the difficulties and dangers of pursuit, traversing the little pitable country, and the hunted animal sort of life he would have to lead, how much so every man's hand would be against him, a good give himself up at the first station he could reach.

Like all such sayings this one had to be taken with qualifications. It was quite true many runaways were overtaken and The horrible hardships they were compelled to undergo, made them at last prefer death to believe that the slavery and wretchedness of convict life were preferable to the torture of mind and body that had to be endured in trying to get free. Nevertheless, a great number, who escape never give themselves up again. Many perish by the way. Some are killed by the wolves, which in the early spring, are particularly ravenous; others kill from exhaustion, and die a lingering and horrible death. But others again on the principle of the saying of Mark Antony, "Cowards suffer a very death by fear, danger, and we to meet death once for all," have, after their return to Russia—and so strong is the attraction of that entire Russia every Russian breast that almost per cent of the fugitives aim for Russia—have an certain number of lives to be detected and sent back to exile, on the plea that they were in a strong mass, during the frontier may ultimately regain admission to their native land and enjoy country their own.

In Tomaska's case there was a very stone- determination on the part of the officers that he should not escape, for his offence in injuring an officer was considered a very grave one, and he was accustomed much by the fact of his being a Jew. As a Jew he was not looked at Christian was a serious business under any circumstances, but he had when he Jew was a convict and the person maltreated an officer of guard, it is considered was the crime could not be exa gerated, and death scathe greatly, and in Masha one the scathed no leader would probably be beaten with the present every day for many days. Nevertheless sufferings were finally ended by the pyre of the indomitable.

If Bachel had not been acquainted with Tomaska soon found out the Bachelsky gossip in the settlement, and she prayed to Tomaska to meet her secretly in a place of a victor, might perish in the tore to, for she declared to think what he would suffer if caught.

When morning dawned a report spread through the settlement that Tomaska had remained insensible, and that the doctor expressed no hope of his recovery. It appeared that the blow had been delivered with such a force as to cause a depressed concussion of the brain, and the chances of rallying were looked upon as poor. Tomaska's wife was sitting by him remained insensible, and though every medical remedy was used to rouse him all efforts failed, and a sudden failure of the heart's action put an end to the poor life.

When Catherine heard the news she laughed and said to Rachel:—

"Heaven rewards your sister, and there is one enemy of the people less."

Rachel felt no pity for Tomaska, but she had come to regard all soldiers and their officers as her enemies, and she seemed to be hated; therefore she could only be expected to rejoice when one of them died.

As for Balakhin, she was full of lamentation. Not for Balakhin's sake for nor sorrow for him; but for Mosha, because if his spouse died he would be free and be the slightest hope for him. Her lamentations, however, were not wasted, for gave in the sorrow-time and tender-eyed, and she, knowing that it was a sad time of the instinctive's recapture her feelings were softened, and she forgave her sister.

"He has found peace at last, the poor at death in the wilderness. But though he suffered much, he will not regret that he fell upon it, yet in the fullness of time we shall meet again in a place where he will be more weeping, and the just and the unjust, the hunted and the hunter, will be at peace."

The little parties that had been sent out in different directions returned in the morning gradually returned but brought no tidings of Mosha, and as the day wore on it used, to give warning to the different stations, that if he did not pass the station grapb wire only followed the post-road it was hardly likely he would be seen, for he knew that his freedom would have been mad enough to traverse the telegraph roads, the only roads he knew of, and he thought that might enable him to escape. Nevertheless, the telegraph was used by many other dangers to be faced that death would be worse than death, and he was sickly glutinering star that seemed to much to finishing heart and weary eyes, and sat lore one on to madness.

When the officers reported themselves there was a general feeling of exasperation, among the officers that Mosha should have eluded—what they would have terrified—but, there was no time for reflection on their loss, for word came to another. "Ah, he is free, and they have to be as he is dead."

Of course, the wish was father to the thought.

As was always the case when a prisoner succeeded in getting away, extra vigilance was exercised, and increased severity was shown to the prisoners left behind. The officers and officers could not resist the temptation to vent their spleen on those who were in their tyranny, but every Russian officer, or official, knew that a Russian prisoner, exile may be, whether high or low, is, generally speaking, a tyrant, and knowing this he felt a certain half fendish delight in exercising his tyranny upon those who are unable to resent it.

Throughout the whole of Siberia this is particularly the case, and it is because they are made callous by the suffering and wretchedness surrounding them. And then the power that is placed in their hands is so great, and that it is so removed from central control, that the brute nature is developed, and they are allowed to gain the ascendency.

The immense distance of the regulations imposed after Umanski's flight and Balakhin's death, prevented the Bachelsky and children—the convicts, as well as the contrary, the officers, and the Russian officers keep to her hut, with the exception of a short time during the morning and afternoon, when Patrovna, who had been promised more freedom, was now increased to two hours, and kept a close prisoner, and the privilege his wife had enjoyed of visiting him at stated intervals was taken away.

Of course, there was no reason or even common sense in all this, but it was only in accord with the usual practice followed at the Kara settlement, if, in fact, throughout Siberia under similar circumstances. The idea that we spoke of before, the notion that the increased harshness and severity would induce the convicts to forget and use their endeavors to prevent the escape of any more of their number, but it had no such effect, and when a prisoner made a break for liberty the whole settlement was furious. Here was too rough and hard a nature to allow the escape of the small measure o freedom she enjoyed dissatisfied with her position, and the prisoner filled and vowed to, to fight with herself and subdue herself; for during that long and painful journey across the steppes she learnt enough of the power of those in command to know that Russia was endowed with the strength of Samson, the craft of Jezebel, and the cruelty of the tigress robbed of her young, she could not hope to prevail against the monster who represented the law, such as it was, and she found a measure of consolation in the thought:

"The day will come."

She meant of course the day of vengeance. But she knew that would come and it would come she could form no idea. Yet was the thought hope to her, and she waited and was silent.

CHAPTER XXIV.

WAS IT A PHANTOM THAT LURED HIM?

Six weeks had passed since Umanski's flight, but no word of his capture had been received. Balakhin had been laid in his grave, and he was about he, grass was waving green above him; for when alone the mourner have departed, reputation in that region grows with astonishing rapidity, and by now the man who was living in a few days the eastward-bound party would recommence their dreary inactive.

To you at least that was joyful news, for the sorrow occasioned by the death of the suspense, was maddening. Those two were Rachel and Catherine.

During all these weeks the latter had not been at liberty to see her husband and she imagine that he was pining with grief and joy, for once more she would look upon Rachel, lost his spirit, and then he promise to his hand. Was not that something to feel joyful for when Rachel had played and freit-and yearned as she had done? During those slow passing months she had dreamed dreams and plotted plots, and what three years ago the prisoner, if he a remark she made one night to Rachel, "Ah, if I could pay for their wretched hovel together. This was the remark, and it seemed to burst from her with the force of a long-pent passion that could b-pent up no longer—

"Have the God go my blessing that we are to leave this accursed spot at last."

"I thank God," was the reply Rachel, speaking in a more subdued way, and yet with a strange intensity in her tone.

"Aye, and hark ye, Rachel," cried Catherine, seizing her companion's wrist in a paroxysm of nervous excitement, and speaking the first with the prisoner, if he not, "before my Paul shall suffer again as he has suffered, I will cut scissors to kill him and then kill myself. They have made me mad, but a mad woman's vengeance is a thing to be dreaded; let them beware!"

"Be not Satan's tool," pleaded Rachel.

"Hush!" echoed her friend with a strange laugh, and then she continued in a whisper, "Is it rash to long for freedom? Is it rash to yearn to see my husband? Have we been robbed you of every joy, who for months past have lived in misery, and you your loved one, who have crushed your heart and ruined your life, and yet you call the curse instead of a blessing? If you think so you are mad."

She ground her teeth and spoke with a vehemence that she had never before displayed, although she had felt it.

Rachel, in answer to Rachel called: "I do not think so." Rachel, I have thought as you have thought, dreamed as you have dreamed, and, if you have been robbed of every joy, my loved ones have been tortured, they heart has been crushed and life ruined, I know how cruelty—my hopes have been broken, and my life has been ruined, instead of blessing. Even the lands will endeavor to make us feel that we should be thankful strange are great, but mine are greater than yours. My home has been ruined, the who was to have been my husband murdered, my wife has been tortured to madness, and my father, a man of good birth and gentle manners, has been made to feel that he was only a slave, while you still have your husband.

Catherine's paroxysm of fury had passed, and through the hysterical nature broke the outburst of passion which even the man's cruelty had failed to evoke, and when quiet she can alternate these outbursts with a sullenness and gentleness which it is next to impossible to be deceived by, and when a woman has reached the maximum of her fury she feels a desire to tears. So it was with Catherine, on this occasion, and though her heart was full of bitter spite in it, and that spot had been touched by Rachel's words, so that she felt her arm around the neck of her sister in sorrow, and sobbing on her breast, she mingled, and she moaned between her sobs:—

"Forgive me, my sister, forgive me."

Afterall, Rachel's nature was the stronger of the two, and she had more power and influence felt.

"Hush, hush, I was wrong; we, I mean, we, I have nothing to complain of. We have a common cause. Let us be true to it and our lives will be lightened by the sight and patience that endurch triumphs in the end.

'I learn from you. I learn from you," she added, with a strange humility, showing how thoroughly she felt the influence of her companion.

Now we must turn for a while to another place and to another and important party in this history, and who has been and still is the most important party in the story, which the chain would be broken.

Through the dreary months, the long and dreary which the two women were suffering and weeping, a man was travelling, or rather, was being driven, for he was a prisoner, and he was being driven by a post-road, with posts, at intervals of 15 miles, with a young man, with white, haggard, care-worn face, on the box, and another, a man of a determined expression of anxiety. His mode of travelling was a peculiar one, the ordinary vehicle, in which the traveler rate, drinks and sleeps, was a long, low, light, but fast carriage, with no runners, not on wheels, but on runners, and drawn by a team of horses.

This man was provide with what is known as "a crown padarozhnaya," which means literally a "road crown," and is the first class in a courier's permit, which takes the place of a passport, and is, in fact, a Government messenger. At every post-station the holder of this document demand horses taken priority, and if there be none at the post, private horses are taken, unless them under pain of a heavy fine. It is a matter of little importance to the man how they are got, but got they must be, and the man generally, on the contrary, but takes priority over the ordinary travelers, and, if he meets with opposition, he has crown padarozhnaya can demand horses and Yamshiks, and, if he meets with any unpleasant, or, rather, unpleasant, he can, on the strength of his

The ladies of the First Congregational Church of Wauconia, Iowa, say an exchange, have broken all laws of methods in the matter of devising schemes for raising money for church work. Saturday afternoon, to the number of 20, they marched to the church basement each carrying a buck-saw and saw horse. One side of the building was partitioned off, and for 10 cents the spectator was permitted to see each lady saw off a stick of wood. The scheme was a tremendous success. Business men, clerks and laborers deserted their posts to gaze at the view of this army of female sawyers on actual duty. Every lady belonging to the society who could get away was there with her saw mill. There was no distinction; the high and low, rich and poor, literally sawed wood. The church treasury was largly benefited.

A BRILLIANT OCCASION.

The Silver Wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Forsyth is Largely Attended.

The silver wedding of Mr. and Mrs. George Forsyth, which occurred at their home in East Brainerd on Friday last was one of the most largely attended occasions in the city this season and highly enjoyed by all. Their spacious house was handsomely decorated with choice potted plants and cut flowers and lighted with wax tapers throughout, the effect being grand. The guests were waited upon by girls handsomely attired and everything went merry as a marriage bell. The tables groaned with their load of good things which had been prepared for the guests. Have You Seen Them.

The Northern Lights Company which is making a week's stand at the opera house in this city are deserving of a better patronage than they are receiving for more reasons than one. The troupe is composed of ladies and gentlemen and their entertainments have so far given the best of satisfaction. Harry Ellis and Mary Ellsworth, the leading people are artists in their profession, and they have been the subject of many complimentary remarks by those who have witnessed the different plays which have been presented. The entire company is above the average. The prices are 10, 20 and 30 cents. Tomorrow (Saturday) evening a dining room set, consisting of a solid oak extension table and six chairs, will be given away to the holder of the lucky number. A grand matinee will be given Saturday afternoon. If you wish to witness a good entertainment at a nominal price attend the performances of the Northern Lights company tomorrow afternoon and evening.

R. A. Sims of Brainerd, connected with the Brainerd & Northern Minnesota, was in Minneapolis to day on business connected with the road. He tells the Tribune that the line is entirely completed as far as it will be built this year, which is 40 miles of line. This will begin hauling logs of this fall's cut by the following week. These logs are to dumped into the Mississippi at Brainerd, part of them to be sawed by the new mill which the Northern Mill company is erecting at that place, and the rest to be run down the river to the company's Minneapolis mill in the spring. —Minneapolis Tribune.

The Paradise Cruise.

"The most beautiful country I ever saw was under the water," said Captain Ezra Whipple, who formerly sailed the salt seas, but now has his stateroom at the Southern. "Coming from Kingston en route to Baltimore, in 1867, I collided off the coast of Cuba with a Dutch three master. A hasty examination was made by the carpenter, who reported slight damage, and we kept on our way. The Dutch vessel had no more than got out of sight when my ship began to fill, and we soon had to desert her and take to the open boats. The sun beat down upon us with terrific force and I became a victim of that peculiar hallucination called by the sailors 'paradise cruse.'

"The sea appeared to be transformed into a mighty meadow, bright with flowers and musical with song of birds. Cool springs burst from crystal rocks and trickled over golden sands, and men and maidens danced beneath the trees. They seemed beckoning me to join them, and I plunged over the side of the boat into forty fathoms of brine. The bath brought me to my senses, and I reached the Cuban coast more dead than alive. The mania is of frequent occurrence in tropical seas and is often referred to by the poets. It may be that to this species of madness the old Greeks were indebted for those beautiful fancies of gods and goddesses reigning in regal splendor beneath the ocean's brine."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Leigh Hunt's Love of Color.

The late Mrs. Duncan Stewart, who knew well most of the English authors of the last sixty years, used to say of Leigh Hunt that she believed him to be the only person who, if he saw something yellow in the distance and was told it was a buttercup, would be disappointed if he found it was only a guinea. Yet those were Leigh Hunt's days of greatest privation. Mr. Carlyle was very poor, too, at this time, yet a friend who knew him very well and went often to see him told Mrs. Stewart that one day going to Carlyle and seeing two golden sovereigns lying exposed in a little vase on the chimney piece he asked what they were there for.

Carlyle looked—for him—embarrassed, and gave no definite answer. "Well, now, my dear fellow," said the visitor, "neither you nor I are quite in a position to play ducks and drakes with sovereigns; what are they for?" "Well," said Carlyle, "the fact is that Leigh Hunt likes better to find them there than that I should give them to him."—New York Tribune.

Forbearance Ceased.

"See here!" yelled the wrathful man as he took off his hat and showed a head as bald as a campaign lie.

"Yes, I see," said the druggist. "Did you every try my unparalleled capillary renovator?"

"That's just what I did," answered the baldheaded man in times of wrath, "and here's the result."

The druggist mused a moment.

"It works that way sometimes," he said. "The hair grows so fast, you see, that it pulls itself out by the roots. Now, if you will only strengthen your scalp by using a few bottles of my acmelstical scalp balm"

At this point they clinched.—Indianapolis Journal.

Anchoring a Boat in China.

Such a thing as an anchor is never seen on a Chinese river. Sometimes a pole is driven down through a hole in the bow, but usually a rope is tied round a boulder or stake on shore, or, in default of these, round a heap of small stones gathered for the purpose.—Cor. Montreal Witness.

OFFICIAL.

It is our earnest desire to impress upon the minds of the public the superiority of the service offered by the Wisconsin Central Lines to Milwaukee, Chicago and all the points East and South. Two fast trains leave St. Paul, Minnapolis and Duluth daily, equipped with Pullman Vestibuled Drawing Room Sleepers, Dining Cars and Coaches of the latest design. Its Dining Car Service is unsurpassed, which accounts, to a great degree, for the popularity of this line. The Wisconsin Central Lines, in connection with Northern Pacific R. R., is the only line from Pacific coast points over which both Pullman Vestibuled, first-class, and Pullman Tourist Cars are operated via St. Paul without change to Chicago.
