T. C. COCHRAN, Prop.

Ex-Senator J. E. McDonald, of Indiana, died at his home in Indianapolis on Sunday.

It is said under the McKinley law the falling off in receipts from custom duties willbe 20 millions.

Iowa democrats have re-nominated Gov. Boies by acclamation. It will not be nearly so easy to elect him.

For the mayor he has said it, and its greatly to his credit, that the festive poker chip and "tin horn" gambler must go.

H. B. Willis has been appointed state oil inspector, vice Sam Nichols, resigned. Mr. Willis served in this capacity under Gov. Merriam.

It is reported that Parnell has taken out a license to marry Mrs. O'Shea, but is having considerable difficulty in finding a clergyman to tie the knot for a divorced woman.

The Behring sea matter bids fair to be amicably adjusted in the near future, in a manner highly satisfactory to the United States, thanks to the superior statesmanship of that greatest of living Americans, James G. Blaine.

Miss Cora Belle Fellows, the western society girl that married Chaska, a Sioux Indian, in North Dakota a couple of years ago, is now reported to have applied for a divorce. Has Cora tired so soon of the "noble red man."

The Journal doesn't like it because we showed in our last issue that Mr. Merrill's reasons for flopping were purely selfish, namely, because the republicans of his own county rejected him for a newcomer that they did not know, and a democrat, too, and not because of principle or want of principle in the republican party. This fact stands out boldly, Bro. Stivers, and can't be successfully denied.

A New Scheme.

A novel plan for extinguishing a church debt has been hit upon in Melbourne, which might be successfully tried by Brainerd churches as a last resort. The church committee—or vestry, as the case may be—divide the total debt among themselves and each man insures his line for the amount that falls to his share. The policies are transferred to the church, and the annual payments on them are made out of the collections. Then, of course, as the members of committee "drop off," the sum insured on their lives drop in, and later, when the last committeeman is dead, the last installment of the church debt will be paid. The plan has the merit—if merit it be—of throwing the whole of the responsibility for the continuance of the indebtedness upon Providence.

A French Description of Chicago.

It is said on good authority that on April 29th, there appeared in a newspaper in Nantes, France, the following description of Chicago: "It is situated at the foot of the falls at Niagara and receives the waters of the great lakes. In no part of Europe will you find so great a city. Its boulevards are regular and as straight as its streets, which seem to have been ruled by a straight-edge, and in it all railroads have termini. One is almost frightened by the height of buildings, in which all styles of architecture meet without confusion. About 16 years ago we first visited the city of Niagara, but our first stop was naturally at Chicago. Excellent hotels, very attractive people were there; and as we took a rapid walk along the 'fathers of waters' we were obliged continually to avoid meeting the descendants of the companion of St. Anthony (pigs). Now these noisy animals have their own quarter, where they are sold, and they no longer, by their squeals, disturb the public peace."

Another Government Reservoir.

Grand Rapids, Minn., June 16.—It is of interest to lumbermen and others, to know finally the intentions of the government regarding its proposed Sandy Lake dam and improvement so-called, which the Lumberman's correspondent can state from official sources. The dam is going in immediately, work having virtually been began. It will be thrown across the mouth of Sandy river, very near its junction with the Mississippi, the site being on the historic ground that was in the early days settled on by Jesuit missionaries, constituting the point of land at the head the main river makes at the Sandy's mouth. The dam will be 130 feet long and eight feet high, and is to contain the newest, best thing for log gates and sluicing, to-wit, the Parker gate. The work will cost between $50,000 and $75,000, and be completed in six months. This will be the last of the Mississippi reservoirs, and this will be one of the very important ones, which in quantity of water to be gotten into control, and in its relation to lumbering and commerce. As to the latter there is a big kick from Messrs. Warren, Palter, Knox, and Laurie, of Aitkin, owners of steamboats, who have made efforts, now found to be futile, to get locks provided for, as boats have always done big traffic on Sandy Lake and river. Sandy lake and Rice lake approximate twenty square miles, but the dam will flow very much more territory, amounting to thousands and thousands of state and railroad swamp lands, extending beyond and along the Northern Pacific railroad. There are now immense areas of valuable hay lands, and it will be an interesting matter to know how the damages to the same will be adjusted. Engineers also believe that the rise will seriously affect the Northern Pacific line.—Lumberman.

Railroad Picnic.

To-morrow, Saturday, June 27th, will occur the annual excursion and picnic of the N. P. company employes of this city. The picnic this year will be held at Detroit Lake, near Detroit, Minn., one of the most charming spots in Minnesota. The excursion train will leave Brainerd at 6 a. m. sharp. A cannon will be fired at 4 a. m. to arouse the excursionists. The Third Regiment Band and Whitford's orchestra will accompany the excursion. At the lake perfect arrangements have been made for the pleasure and comfort of the picnicers, the use of the dancing pavilion having kindly been granted. For lovers of the terpsichorean art. The steamer Minnie Corliss will make excursion trips about the lake at a fare of 20 cents for the round trip. Row boats can be had at 25 cents for the first hour, 35 cents for two hours, and 50 cents for the afternoon. All manner of games, races, etc., will take place at the picnic grounds. Pillager News.

Crops are looking better than they have for years.

A game of base ball was played between the Motley and Pillager teams, but decided in favor of Motley, the score standing 40 to 60.

The school house has been removed to the railroad track and repaired. School began Monday with an attendance of 20 scholars. C. A. Allbright, of Brainerd, is teacher.

Wm. Wilson, one of the old pioneer residents of Pillager, is very sick and not expected to live.

A. B. Cale's drive of 800 cords of spruce wood is passing here in the Crow Wing river, going to the Little Falls paper mills. G. W. Brintner has charge.

Our merchant, Dan Holliday, is buying and shipping to Motley some very fine cultivated strawberries this week. He is also preparing for the blueberry crop by making crates before the rush.

Simmons & Johnson's saw mill will be through sawing for the season in a few days.

Our section foreman, Mr. Doty, and family, visited with relatives at Wadena on Saturday. Slim.

It is reported that Mrs. John A. Logan will soon marry George E. Lemon, the millionaire pension attorney.

Railroad Picnic.

What Have The Saloons Done For Brainerd?

The W. C. T. U. of Brainerd hereby offer one year's subscription to any one of our popular magazines—to be chosen by the winner—for the best essay on the subject, "What Have the Saloons Done for Brainerd?" The essays are to be handed to Mrs. Vosburgh, president of the society, in sealed envelopes, together with the names of the writers, also in sealed envelopes. As the papers come in they will be numbered, and the envelope containing the writers name will receive the same number. About the middle of July—time and place will be announced later—the essays will be read, and the one receiving the highest number of votes from the judges, to be appointed by the society, shall be declared winner, and the envelopes bearing the corresponding number shall be opened and the writers name announced. After the decision has been announced the other envelopes shall be destroyed, unopened. It is hoped that many will compete for this prize.

CONQUERED THE OLD MAN.

One More Instance of Woman's Invincible Way of Doing Things.

An extremely stout, choleric old gentleman sat in his office on Friday fuming over a lot of paper and swearing to himself, says the New York Sun. He was in a beastly temper, for things had gone wrong ever since morning, and now and then he cast his eyes about as if in search of something to kick as an outlet for his tempestuous state of mind.

"That book agent is out here, sir," said a clerk, thrusting his head through the door.

"Show him in," yelled the old gentleman greedily, "and I'll kick the everlasting stuffing out of him."

A minute later a pretty girl came demurely in, and, calmly drawing a chair up to the old gentleman's desk, smiled sweetly.

"Just excuse me a minute," said the oh fellow, "there's a nasty book agent coming."

"I am the book agent, sir," said the girl, and she thrust a hand away down through a hole in her dress and brought up a volume.

"Can't I sell you a copy sir," she said coolly, running through the leaves. "It is only $5, and is profusely illustrated and so needful that no home is complete without one. Buy a copy, please, and I shall forget that you called me nasty."

"I didn't," puffed the old gentleman, excitedly. "I swear I never said anything of the kind. Leave the book."

What the old gentleman picked up his book to carry it home he discovered that it was a collection of love songs.

Economical.

Some persons are neat for love of neatness, and others for other considerations.

Housekeeper: I want this room whitewashed, but I dread the mess of it all.

Uncle Pete: Guess you've had some ob dese here cheap whitewashers at work. I'se very 'ticular ma'am. I'se whitewashed some ole dirt fences in de city. Whitewash am too expensive ter spill 'roun on furniture.—Epoch.

Almost Remembered.

Ernest's grandfather is a doctor, and had been for some time treating a patient for St. Vitus' dance.

Ernest had seen the sufferer from the strange nervous disease, and felt much sympathy for him.

The other day he hurried from his grandfather's office to his mother's room to say, "O mamma, mamma, here's another poor little boy who has the—the—I can almost think of the name—the St. Patrick's jump!"

The figure 9 in our dates will make a long stay. So man or woman now living will ever date a 9 but without using the figure 9. It stands in the third place in 1891, where it will remain for one hundred years, it will rest for one hundred years, in 1902, where it will rest for one hundred years.

There is another "9" which has also come to stay. It is unlike the figure 9 in our dates in the respect that it has already moved up to first place, where it will permanently remain. It is called the "No 9" High Arm Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine.

The "No. 9" was endorsed for first place by the experts of Europe as the Paris Exposition of 1889, where, after a severe contest with the leading machines of the world, it was awarded the only Grand Prize given to family sewing machines, all others on exhibit having received lower awards of gold medals, etc. The French Government also recognized its superiority by the decoration of Mr. Nathaniel Wheeler, President of the company, with the Cross of the Legion of Honor.

The "No. 9" is not an old machine improved upon, but is an entirely new machine, and the Grand Prize at Paris was awarded it as the great advance in sewing machine construction of the age. Those who have it can rest assured, there' s no other machine like it.

It is announced that a company of New Yorkers intend to make a search for the buried treasures of Capt. Kidd this summer. The Grant monument committee at last has been heard from; may its search be successful!

In view of the fact that President Hippolyte of Hati is only a successful insurgent himself his recent action in ordering wholesale executions of insurgents is hardly consistent although decidedly effective in its way.

It is said that the very latest fad is for young married women to speak in uncomplimentary terms of their husbands. If this be true young men of the present age may as well marry their mother-in-law and be done with it.

Two Illinois ministers were sent to the penitentiary last week for passing counterfeit money. A good many ministers have had a lot of bad money worked off on them through the contribution-box and nobody has been sent to prison for it.

The Chinese do not like foreigners. The port of Kinnychow has been open to trade since 1870, yet no foreign trader or Consul has so far been able to purchase land on which to erect buildings, although waste land is plentiful.

Although the Pope is now in his 81st year his voice is still strong and clear, and there is no sign of decay in his intellectual faculties. Even his memory, which is usually the first of the faculties to decline, is accurate and tenacious.

Director Hennessy, of the whisky trust, denies that prices are to be advanced. Many worthy citizens were beginning to fear that they would have to economize on bread and give up meat altogether this summer, but this assurance from Mr. Hennessy will dispel their fears.

The census bulletin shows that the number of inmates of insane asylums has increased seventy-three per cent in the last eight years. One mathematician calculates that at this rate it will be just one hundred and twenty years before the whole population takes up its residence in these abodes.

The French government is reported to have siezed a portion of the Libarian coast, and the African republic will appeal to the United States for protection. Just let the climate of the Liberian coast alone and it will settle the dispute. It is more deadly to the white man than an army with banners or a fleet with big guns.

Coal is the result of the mineralization of vegetable matter. Noless than 294 species have been found and described in British coal alone. The greatest proportion of these plants seemed to have flourished in marshy swamps, and to have accumulated where they grew like peat, and though the great geological changes they were ultimately converted into coal.

An attempt is being made to devise an attachment for fish poles that will register the pulling strength, and thereby assist in determining the weight of those big fish that always get away. It's all right, of course, since the fish always carries his own scales with him when he escapes, but it's the pull on the bottle of "bait" at the end of the day which gives the flavor to the big fish story.

According to the census just completed the population of London, is 5,211,056, which is somewhat smaller than was anticipated. That of Paris, also just completed comes a little under 2,500,000. Both cities, in the enumeration of inhabitants, embrace all the surrounding suburbs. If New York and its suburbs were to be counted-that way, it would easily distance Paris, and in another decade would be closely crowding London, as to population.

In Russia the station agents often keep forged tickets to sell along with the genuine, only at reduced rates, the passenger, of course, taking his chances with the inspector. Nothing to the forging way would be tolerated here, but the road may put genuine tickets in the hands of scalpers to sell at reduced rates, and at the same time solemnly warn the public that tickets bought of scalpers are invalid. The analogy between the Russian and American way is that in both cases the passenger pays his money and takes his chances.

MADE A CONFESSION

Philadelphia's Ex-City Treasurer Tells the Whole Story of His Illegal Transactions.

Strong Denials That He Had Been Benefited to the Extent of a Dollar.

Philadelphia, June 24.—John Bardsley, ex-city treasurer, who several days ago pleaded guilty to embezzlement of public funds, was brought into the criminal court for sentence to-day, but on motion of District Attorney Graham sentence was suspended indefinitely.

Public expectation has been wrought up by the statement when he was brought into court, Bardsley would make a full and free confession of his embezzlement, for many it was thought that in his statement or "confession" Bardsley would implicate men high in business and official life. Men whose names have only been hinted at, but who are generally believed to be implicated. Such expectations proved groundless, for Bardsley's confession practically confessed nothing that has not been made known through the columns of the daily press.

Bardsley's statement in full came in for several scoring at the hands of Bardsley, and he held in his door that he sunk his money in the Keystone bank.

BARDSLEY'S STATEMENT.

Mr. Alexander then said his client desired to make a statement to the court.

Mr. Bardsley arose and read his prepared statement. The statement consumed an hour and a quarter in reading.

As Bardsley read his voice was clear, distinct and audible in every part of the court house. When he was through he was compelled to cease reading when he spoke of his family, but otherwise he read firmly and unfalteringly.

He told all about his transactions with the Keystone bank, and how he was induced to borrow money and the amounts. The statement continued:

"During all these months, and especially during December, Bank Examiner Dyer made many visits to the bank, and I was in constant fear that he would discover the bad security, and that the people would hear no confidence in the bank. I was aware that the Keystone was all right and in as good condition as any bank in the city, but I was compelled to cease reading when he spoke of his family, but otherwise he read firmly and unfalteringly.

Condition of the Treasury.

Washington, Special.—The United States treasury statement issued to-day, but bearing date June 17, shows an apparent deficiency of $1,000,000. The statement does not include $23,627,412 on deposit with national banks subject to draft for redemption of national bank notes and for purchase of silver. Including these two items the cash balance in the treasury is $46,000,000. The treasury's office say that, exclusive of national bank deposits and the gold reserve, there is an actual available balance of $1,812,000 in the treasury, according to the last treasurer's statement, including the receipt from customs to-day of $1,500,000. The treasury's office say that, exclusive of national bank deposits and the gold reserve, there is a constant excess of receipts over expenditures for the month of June of $5,000,000 and it is estimated that the net surplus will be at least $3,000,000 for the month. Treasury officials are not disturbed over the situation and say that the condition is simply due to a temporary lack of funds.

A Calamity Averted.

London, Special.—Fears prevail in financial circles as to the difficulties which have arisen between Mr. Murietta, head of the banking house of Murietta & Co., recently transformed into a limited liability company, and the trustees and executors of the new corporation, owing to the discovery that the liabilities of Murietta & Co. exceed the liabilities represented to the trustees when the new corporation formed. It is also said that fresh liabilities have been incurred since the formation of the limited liability company which required the further subscription of nearly $175,000 in order to avoid a calamity.

MY LADY'S HAIR.

BY O. G. HOUSES.

It is not dark like raven night;
Nor be it fair;
Nor is it burnished with the light
That bronzed the hair
Of those fair Saxon maids of old,
Of whom the minnesingers told
And sung with sweet inspired flow
So long ago!

It hath a sweet, hypnotic smell
Of flowers rare,
That wove about my brain a spell—
This moment dare!
I worshiped—but the charm for me
Has vanished. In a dream I see
My lady's hair still tenderly
Upon a chair!

HORSESHOE LUCK.

M I too old to think of a second marriage" said Mrs. Lydia, looking wistfully into the glittering sheet of mirror that extended at the other side of the room into an indefinite perspective of cozy tables, stands of ferns, Japanese screens and Indian hangings. "Six-and-thirty—and why should one be compelled to give up all the sweetness of life at six-and-thirty? I'm sure I don't look a day over thirty; and Algy Vane must be that at least!"

Mrs. Blythe was a very pretty woman—not the tpd, but the full blown rose—a plump, dimpled, peach-cheeked matron, who knew exactly how to make the most of all her middle aged advantages.

She had married Maj. Mortlake Blythe at 17, and he had left her a widow at seven-and-twenty.

"I shall never be such a fool as to marry again" said Mrs. Blythe.

For the major had by no means been perfection. He had been for just enough, by dint of strict economy, to live upon, especially as her own and child had been taken to "bring up" by a quiet Quaker couple, the major's relatives. And until now Mrs. Blythe had adhered resolutely to her decision.

But Algeron Vane was a royally handsome fellow, and the pretty widow was but human, and had already scribbled "Rosamond Vane," "Mrs. Algeron Vane," over and over again in her blotting book, and had even transured up a flower he had worn in his buttonhole, and which she had corresponded with him during the winter he had spent in Bermuda, writing sprightly and amusing letters, with a semi-tone of seriousness underlying all their sparkling gossip.

"He likes me a little now," said the widow, "and I'm determined he shall like me a good deal more. I am tired of this solitary life; I'm tired of counting every penny half a dozen times before I spend it. Algy is independently rich, and he is my beau ideal of a man. With him I do believe I should be quite happy. He don't know about Lydia, but of course that would be no objection. Uncle Joshua and Aunt Rebecca will keep her. Dear me, dear me! she must be growing to be a big girl now," and Mrs. Blythe shuddered at the idea.

At this moment the door flew open, and in bust a tall, dusty, disheveled young girl, some half a head taller than Mrs. Blythe herself, with the white capped maid following helplessly behind.

"Please, ma'am," said the maid, "she wouldn't wait for me to take her card up."

"Mamma, I'm Lydia!" cried the breathless apparition. "Little Liddy, mamma—don't you remember? And that hateful girl to go away! A card, indeed! As if I need to send up cards to my own mother!"

Mrs. Blythe stood appalled, in the soft velvet light streaming through the China silk curtains. This fair haired, unmannered young giantess with the peony cheeks and the big blue eyes, the ill-fitting gloves and fashionable gown—could it be possible that this was the "little Liddy" of ten years ago? Oh, if Mr. Vane should see her!

"Oh, mamma, how pretty you are!" said she, "and what a lovely room! Are you glad to see me, mamma, darling?"

"My dearest child," gasped the widow, "what has brought you here?"

Lydia stripped her hands; her countenance fell.

"Mamma," said she, "I'm the most miserable creature in the world—and I want a hundred dollars!"

"Lydia! a hundred dollars!"

"And you must let me have it!" vehemently went on Lydia. "I've killed Uncle Joshua's pet colt! I'm sure I didn't exactly do it myself; but I was riding pretty Jane around the meadow just for practice, and I forgot and left the bars down, and the colt got out on the railroad track, and the train came along, and—oh! I never can look Uncle Joshua in the face again, unless I have that hundred dollars to pay him!"

"I shall be able to earn plenty for myself before long mamma," sheadded breathlessly, "for I can ride better than the woman in pink tarlatan and spangles who jumped through the hoops in the circus. When the old gypsy told my fortune last year, at the county fair, she said a horseshoe would bring me luck some day—and I knew, of course, what she meant. So I've been practicing riding ever since, whenever I could get a horse to ride—at Beck and Uncle Joshua, and—"

"Lydia!" a hundred dollars!"

Mrs. Dappleton Anne is in the drawing room, ma'am," said the white capped maid, appearing with an oxidized silver card receiver in her hand.

And Mrs. Blythe checked her daughter's confidence by a look of horror.

"Lydia," cried she, "I'm surprised at you! A great girl like you scolding and romping around the country! Go back to Shady Plains by the very next train, and try to behave more like a lady. Why, you must be fourteen at least!"

"Seventeen, mamma," confessed the culprit. "But aren't you going to give me the hundred dollars?"

"I have not got a hundred cents!" impatiently cried Mrs. Blythe. "And if I had, I would not give it to you, you naughty, ill behaved, romping—Tye, Matilda, tell Mrs. Dappleton Anne that I shall be down directly, and bring some tea and buns for—for Miss Blythe before the next train goes."

But when Mrs. Dappleton Anne had finished her call, and Mrs. Blythe came back, the bird and flown. Lydia, deeply wounded and resenting had promptly returned to Shady Plains.

"That old gypsy must have been a humbug after all!" sighed the disappearing girl. "Oh, what shall I say to Uncle Joshua? Why was mamma so cold and cruel to me? Oh, if Algy Vane am very, very unhappy!"

"Shady Plains!" shouted the conductor.

And as Lydia crept sorrowfully out of the train something brought her a fallen drop of dew, scintillated on the floor at his feet. She stopped to pick it up. It was a diamond sacrpin in the shape of a horseshoe.

"Squire Carhart's company must have dropped it," said Lydia to her. self. "Oh, how it sparkles! If it were only mine! For his sake it must be worth more than a hundred dollars."

She glanced forlornly at a tall broad shouldered young fellow who had been seated in the train a few seats beyond her.

"He never looked around," thought Lydia. "I am glad of it, for he must have known that I had been crying. But I must give this back to him.

With a light, swift step she hastened to overtake Squire Carhart's city guest.

"Please is this yours?" said she, holding up the glittering half circle. "I found it on the car floor close to where you were sitting."

He started and raised his hat.

"It is Mr. Woodbury's mine, isn't it?" said he—"Miss Lydia! Yes it is mine, and I'm a thousand times obliged to you. I must have fastened it in very carelessly. And I value it very highly, too; it was a gift from my father."

"Is it worth a hundred dollars?" asked Lydia, timidly lifting her sea blue eyes to his face.

"About a hundred dollars, I suppose."

"I wish it was mine," said Lydia, with a long sigh, as if she were thinking aloud.

"Yours? Why, it isn't a lady's ornament."

"Will you let me drive you as far as Worth farm?" asked the stranger, courteously.

And tired Lydia willingly acceded.

The upshot was that when she entered her uncle's presence she gave him a check for the money, representing the price of "the prize colt."

"Where did thee get this money, child?" solemnly asked Uncle Joshua.

"I—I borrowed it," confessed Lydia.

"Don't ask me any more questions, uncle. I'll pay it back if I have to pick blackberries at four cents a quart all summer!"

"I hope thee will give up this hoydenish business of scampering about on horseback, Lydia," said Aunt Rebecca, severely spoke Aunt Rebecca.

"Well, well, the old fortune teller told me that my fortune would one day be made by a—"

Lydia stopped abruptly as she remembered how the diamond horseshoe had been pinned on the inside of her dress, and how she had blushed from head to foot that day. Her color rose, her heart beat.

"You must remember, Lydia," admonished Aunt Rebecca," murmured the girl.

But from that day an inscrutable change came over the whole character of her life.

The pleasant summer sunshine had faded out of the land. The Saratoga belle, Mrs. Blythe, no longer was desorted.

Even Mrs. Blythe, sitting in the yellow light of her jonquil silk curtains was smiling over a card which Matilda had just brought in.

"Dear Algy!" she murmured. "I know he would come!"

It was a most white and gold drawing room, all gracious cordiality.

"Algeron Vane's cavalier!" she cried. "I've half a mind to scold you, and yet—"

"Do I deserve that title?" Mr. Vane asked. "For you are the first person to whom I have told the sweet secret of mess of my life. Oh, I see you don't understand me! Come out from behind the curtains, Lydia, and help me to explain."

"We are married, mamma," said Lydia. "Algy and I, and we are off to Europe in the Comandria, at noon. Won't you kiss me, mamma, and wish me joy?"

Mrs. Blythe kissed Lydia—and Algy, too—and wished them joy.

But it was the severest ordeal to which she ever had been put. A mother-in-law instead of a bride! This was hardly what she had looked forward to.

But even in that trying moment she noticed thelittering pin which fastened Lydia's veil—a pin in the shape of a quaint device of tiny diamonds—and remembered what the girl had once told her about a fortune told by a horseshoe.

"Mamma, didn't look quite pleased, Algy," said the bride, when they were back in the carriage, driving to the steamer's pier. "Do you think maybe she is vexed because we didn't take her into our confidence?"

"Not at all," remarked Mr. Vane, "that no mother likes to lose her daughter suddenly. Least of all one so ling, so sweat a treasure as you."

And neither of the two suspected what a consequence that pin was to be ranklring in the breast of Mrs. Rosamond Blythe.—Helen Grace Graves in Philadelphia Saturday Night.

The Story of a Book Clerk.

Mark Twain told me a good story the other day, says the New York correspondent of the Buffalo Courier. It illustrated the point that all the clerks in our book stores are not well informed in literary matters.

The humorist's wife and a friend entered a store to look over the wares in a city of good size, not many miles from New York. Accosting a clerk the lady woman said that she would desired to secure a copy of Taine's "Ancient Regime."

"Beg pardon," said the clerk; "what book did you say?"

Going to the rear of the store, the clerk soon returned, only to inquire: "May I ask you to repeat the name of the author?"

"Why, Taine," replied Mrs. Clemens, becoming a little annoyed.

Assuming an air of superior knowledge, and looking at his customers with a patronizing expression of sympathy, he ventured to Mrs Clemens:

"Pardon me, madame, but you have the name a trifle wrong. You mean Twain—not Taine."

And it takes Mark Twain to tell the story.

Identifying in China.

In China a traveller desiring for a passport is compelled to have the palm of his hand brushed over with fine oil-paint; he then presses his hand on thin damp paper, which retains an impression of the lines. This is used to prevent transferences of the passport, as the lines of no two per, persons' thumbs are alike, and also that the thousand-and-one signs of character in China's thumbs are alike. Here the police have a system of photographs to identify criminals; the Chinese police keep impressions of each criminal's thumbs in carefully labelled and numbered. He may shave, he may wear a wig, he may paint himself white, he may pay hundreds of taels and life or old and crippled, but he cannot alter the characteristics of thumbs, which can at any time be traced on paper and compared with the impressions always kept in the registody by the Celestial detective force.

An Infuriated Bear.

A large black bear entered a tunnel in the Santa Maria mine, in Ducloume County, California, and attacked several miners. As the men realized their danger, which was made apparent only by the dim light of their candles, they ran for their lives, but a demon attacked the brute. The foreman struck the bear first and kept blocking his infuriated steps, and he made a resistless charge on the men, entangling nearly all their candles and lacerating every one more or less. One man named Dougherty, with his right arm torn from the shoulder at the bear's paw, others had flesh cut of their arms laid bare. The contest in the darkness and close atmosphere lasted an hour, when the bear was killed; more by good luck than by skill. Exhausted as the men were, they dragged the bear out of the tunnel and took it to their station on a car.

Not the Proper Thing.

Mrs. Dukane—A New York man, who was despondent over his blighted love affairs, has shot his sweetheart.

Dukane—I don't see how that could hurry matters.—Chronic Telegraph.

"I PROMISE."

"Viva! Viva! I must go!"

"You shall not! You shall not! You belong to me!"

The beautiful little creature stamped her tiny foot on the turf, as she spoke; her eyes flamed with anger, a flush shot up into her dark cheek.

"I belonged to my country before I ever saw you, Viva," answered Tom Creighton, in a sad but steady tone.

"You shall not go though! Ah! dear, dear, darling Tom, can you leave your little lassie to die of fear? Don't you love her?"

She gathered the tall fellow's hands close to her heart, and clasped them there.

It was a pretty picture—passionate strength, Tom stooped and lifted her to his bosom as if she had been a tiny child.

"I could not love thee, dear, so much Lovel I hot honor more,"

he said, slowly, bending his head to her ear. A proud look in it was, crowned with close curls soon to fall before the shears, and its symmetry to be hidden by a forage cap; and the light of battle was in his eye. His strong, regular features, its cleft chin, and resolute lips, all "gave the word assurance of a man," while the expressive gray eyes revealed "high courage, meek, pathos, passion, and a possible touch of sin."

"Don't talk to me about honor!" sobbed Viva, hiding her face on his shoulder. "It shall not drive you from me! I can't—I can't bear it!"

Naturally she was jealous about Genevice L'Estrange; her French descent had given her inexpressible charms of aspect and manner, and she was slight as a girl of ten years, and no higher than her lover's shoulder, but the contour of her slender figure showed the roundness and grace of womanhood, and the glossy, jet black tress was alight with all the fire of an intense feminine nature. There was nothing childish in the passion that melted according to her mood, the abundant, silky black hair that fell to her feet when unbound, and the heavy coils that seemed too weighty for the lovely little head they covered.

"Viva, you must tell Capt. Creighton."

"I will not!" she answered, angrily "But you must!"

"I never will! After all these stretch-ers you have told me, I think I will throw my life away, Dr. Sands!"

"If you do not, I shall."

"You won't! you can't!"

"But I shall. It is my duty. Hyou do not tell him before Saturday—this is Tuesday—I shall."

Next day came Tom with startling news; he was ordered at once to Fort Griffin, Texas, where there was needed in a struggle with the Indians; fresh troops must join the fort; there was not a day to spare.

"Viva, will you go with me"

Tom, preparing to press the coils where she lay, pale and sweet, after her way of escape from Dr. Sands.

"I will not, Tom. You shall not leave me again, Tom!"

"Viva, I must start early, like a pair of eloping lovers, they were married in the near church and took the morning train for the West; they and on the rushing wheels bore them to the border, where, after a brief separation of the crowd, till at last they arrived at St. George one Winter night and were married, by the post chaplain, and Viva would not let him go alone.

"It's rough, dear love," he said.

"Not with you Tom."

"Forty below zero, Viva?"

"If you can live in it I can. 'I promise' Tom,"

But you must refuse her after that word with all its memories. Bullet like the snow flakes fell, the wind at her feet, they set out on their twenty-mile journey. Warmed not even by the fire. Tom was not fit for their lungs to admit it. all its chill, silently they sped along. The glittering fields of sparkling snow, on which the moon made a long wake of glory, the black shadows, the peace of their swift runners, the snorting of the horse, whose nostrils were lung with icicles, all added to a sense of rest to the drive, a drive that seemed endless, but at last is over.

"Come!" said Tom, holding out his arms as the driver drew up before the sentry's quarters, where the light of a fire blazed through the deep frosted windows, but Viva neither spoke nor moved.

Mad with terror, Tom lifted her from the sleigh and rushed into the door, making his way to her instead of the fire. Viva stirred not an atom. Tom's trembling hand laid on her cheek, laid her on the sofa. Her face was set in death, her lips were closed, her eyes glazed. The post-surgeon hurried in, he lifted one hand, it fell back, he put his finger on her pulse. "She is dead!" he said, with a look of dreadful pity.

Was it a year? Was it a lifetime? Was he in heaven when he awoke out of that?

She was there, warm, sweet, rosy lipped, with promise in her eyes. "I did not die."

Tom turned on his face and wept like a very child; his heaven had come on earth.

Post surgeons do not know every thing any more than any other man. The fact was that Viva had developed in the last two years a tendency to catalepsy—the result of an overworn and overexcited nervous system; and when Dr. Sands told her she must tell Tom about it, she had just come out of a spasm of weeping and prostration of pain for hours as one dead; but she would not tell him, having an idle fear that it might cause his death.

The long journey and the cold drive in the bitter weather, and at night, as she certainly, in appearance, justified the post-surgeon's opinion; but before morning she had come back to herself, and was heart-broken to find Tom delirious with grief and, unconscious of her presence as she had been of his.

"Viva," he said, a few days' after they were fairly settled in their home, "my darling! my wife! think what might have happened if I had never known you! Thank God, I promised, I promised!"

"Promise, promise!" she shrieked, "You must promise me that you will die here, right in your arms, unless you do!"

Her pallid face, her streaming eyes, the sobs that seemed to rend her slight frame, the piteous cry of her red lips, took him by storm. The lovely, unreasoning, willful creature, torn by passionate love and grief all at once, shook his strong soul to its centre. What man ever could resist such overwhelming passion, or thought it foolish when he was its object? Tom Creighton's promise was given, and he held that tiny figure closer to his breast.

"I promise," he said.

So he went and she stayed. The fortunes of war favored Tom in the battle he seemed to dodge the bullets that rained upon him, manfully as he fought, for he did not fight hungrily eyes upon him. "Creighton's luck" was the jest of the decimated regiment, but no man changed him with cowardice. The thrill and splendor of this new life had roused all his reservation; the war justified itself by its dash and valor. He rejoiced in the danger of trumpets, the smoke of engine, the rush of its charges; and when the mission was at an end, where he lay encamped [delied and seared his flesh with fever, when he was left unconscious for a week in the hospital, the will to live, the intent to keep his vow to Viva grew upon him. The nurses wondered to hear but two words in the low mutter of his delirium: "I promise, I promise!" but those words were his talisman.

Every man in the field he became a wonder of alertness; hairbreadth escapes seemed to be his portion every day, when the battalion were entrenching themselves, and the commanding officer was making his survey of the ground he dismounted and thrown himself under the fire of the enemy's rest. Col. Creighton—for he had been promoted—dashed up on his black mare and saluted.

"General," he said, "you have done beyond the lines and reconnoitre the lay of the land!"

"Do so," said Gen. B., springing up; "and I will go with you."

As they both trotted past the intrenchments a colonel in command called out to them:

The general smiled and looked at Creighton, who laughed; and on they went. Soon the pickets were passed, but no enemy was sighted, and, led on by the beauty of the way, as a desire to grasp the situation, they presently fast down a wood road, turned a short corner, and behold! twenty or thirty men, a picket guard, or, rather, a reconnoissance of the foe. Quicker than a lightning flash, no pause to think, no worst said, except that of promise," branded on his inward ear, Creighton's sabre flashed from its sheath; and whirling it round his head, he looked over his shoulder and shouted, "Forward! Charge!"

And putting spurs to his horse flew at them, the general instantly following his run and close beside him, rushed upon the startled enemy, who fled like sheep. One only stood his ground two men turned and ran their horses to the lines; but that swift manoeuvre left Creighton and the general alone to deal with the foe.

It was a man in the prison where scores of men died of untold agonies; for in those dreadful depths Tom Crigton lived. When his eyes met his, he smiled, he seemed to see Viva's upturned, woful face, and he said to himself, "I promise," with enough emphasis of time; for he had learned faith in himself. At last the war was over; he had thoroughly wedded to a soldier's life, and became a proverb among men for courage and coolness, and was soon transferred to the ranks of the regular army, and a handsome, six months, and flew at once to Viva.

Poor Viva! the war had spared her husband, but had made her a widow during his absence, and she was quite alone. To describe their meeting would be needless, even as the meeting of those who arise together at the rising of the dead and live. Viva had a doctor to an adjutant.

Of the three root crops rutabagas should be sown first, as they require longer to make a good growth than the others. They should be sown in nest, if any difference is made, and then the turnips, although a good plan is to mix mangel and rabbi seeds. From the middle to the latter part of July is considered the best time to sow the seed. The best rule to follow is to sow whenever the soil is in condition to secure a good germination. Prepare the soil nicely and then sow the seed and after a rain, sowing broadcast, can often be sown when early crops are being cultivated and many are considered catch crops because they occupy the ground only a short time, and that for a considerable extent after the first crops have made their growth. Of course in a very dry season these crops often prove a failure, partially or wholly, but in an average season very fine as well as profitable yields can be secured, and those that cannot be marketed profitably can always be fed to stock to an advantage.—N. J. S., in Prairie Farmer.

Millet for Fodder.

A correspondent of the Orange County Farmer has something to say about millet, of which, he remarks, we seldom hear as a feeding crop. His own experience, after a trial of six years, is such that he speaks in the highest terms of it. He could not get grass seed to take, and had to find something to cut his hill for fodder, and discovered that millet did it very satisfactorily, the horses and cows feeding on it in place of hay.

Last season he sowed enough for his stock and so did not feed his millet all out in the fall, having about a ton of it left over until spring. While doing spring work, thinking a change of feed would be beneficial, he thought he would try his seed barn on the millet, though somewhat doubtful whether they would eat it after it had lain in the barn all winter. He was surprised at the result. They ate it and seemed to do as well as better than good hay, and they held their condition with half grain, doing the same work.

There are few in this section who grow it to considerable extent, some few only sowing a piece to cut for a change of hay, especially is this the case with those farmers who keep their fields under the plow and do not seed down to grass except at long intervals.

His own experience is that, where grass is sown for hay, the ground you cannot get more feed from an acre of ground than to sow it with German millet. But it must be worth to enrich the ground for the regular crop and getting a fine lot of feed (if well cured) with little trouble or expense.

On this subject the Maine Farmer quotes the statement of a New Eng. land Farmer that "none of the millets are fit to seed with grass," and says: "This does not hold good for Maine. Many good farmers in this State practice sowing mixed for its yield of Hungarian, and with excellent success. We have seen many fine fields of grass thus treated."

What to Do With Them.

A new use has been found by a Canadian farmer for surplus tomatoes. He had about a thousand bushels left over after his market became glutted with them, and he thought of feeding this apparently worthless surplus to his cows. To his surprise and gratification the animals ate them greedily with the result that the flow of milk was largely increased. Having a theory, from some previous experience, that he might dispose of his tomatoes, green or ripe, by canning them, he put them in a field into which he could turn the hungry cows.

After the first frost he writes, we pulled the tomato vines and collected the fruit—both the green tomatoes adhering, where they remained a couple of weeks after the vines had been cut in the field. By that time we found that a large percentage of the green tomatoes had ripened, and the remainder leaves had cured. The cows could not be kept away from these tomato-piles, but they rooted over with their noses and horns, and cleaned up everything in the lines, night and at nights, as long as the tomatoes lasted, they would come into the barn painfully full of tomatoes and distended. It is for scientists to say whether the milk-producing properties of the tomato itself or whether it supplemented some other food to make a well-balanced ration, but the farmer would not pay to raise tomatoes as food for cows, but market gardeners need not see their surplus tomatoes go to waste while they have cows to feed.

Various Uses of Oil.

The virtues of oil on the farm are little thought of. It is both a lubricant and a preservative, and should always be kept ready for use, with care that the supply does not run out and harness and machinery suffer for want of it. A can or half pint bottle of linseed oil, or other machine work, for a little much-needed oil. It is better to buy in large quantities comparatively cheap, but it must be at hand and can generally be bought cheaper. Certainly the supply will not be exhausted so soon. For harness dressing and cracked hog's lard and castor oil is recommended; adding the oil to the mixture to give the right consistency. For the wood-work of tools, nothing is better than boiled linseed oil. It preserves it in proper, the wood-work of tools and machinery in city or the squirrel tools as soon as the oven begins to come up.

The creamery system is to be recommended because it so largely reduces the drudgery of woman's work on the farm. Churning and managing the cream and butter are hard work, and demand a good deal of time when done properly. Creameries should be as plentiful as school houses, and private dairies consigned to sparsely settled regions.

Late Crops—Millet for Fodder—What to Do With Them—Various Uses of Oil—Care of the Stallion.

Late Crops.

Buckwheat and rye for fall and winter pasture, turnips, rutabagas, and winter radishes can be sown in many cases after the wheat and oats are harvested and yet give a good yield. A good way to put in the rye is to sow the seed broadcast among the corn just before the last cultivation. In a majority of cases where the corn is foul with weed seeds—this is all that will be necessary. By the time the corn is harvested and ripened the rye will have made such a growth as to afford a considerable amount of feed in the fall and early winter.

Buckwheat is a good crop to grow for green manuring, and when plowed in addition to the effect produced upon the soil, places it next to clover to plow under as a green fertilizer.

Wheat or oat stubble can be broken up and the ground well broadcast and harrowed in and a sufficient growth will be secured before frost to turn under a good layer of fertilizer. If desired, in anything like a fair season a good crop of rutabagas can be secured. Buckwheat makes a good feed for winter, as the grain can be fed as a change to nearly all kinds of stock to an advantage.

Of the three root crops rutabagas should be sown first, as they require longer to make a good growth than the others. They should be sown in nest, if any difference is made, and then the turnips, although a good plan is to mix mangel and rabbi seeds. From the middle to the latter part of July is considered the best time to sow the seed. The best rule to follow is to sow whenever the soil is in condition to secure a good germination. Prepare the soil nicely and then sow the seed and after a rain, sowing broadcast, can often be sown when early crops are being cultivated and many are considered catch crops because they occupy the ground only a short time, and that for a considerable extent after the first crops have made their growth. Of course in a very dry season these crops often prove a failure, partially or wholly, but in an average season very fine as well as profitable yields can be secured, and those that cannot be marketed profitably can always be fed to stock to an advantage.—N. J. S., in Prairie Farmer.

Millet for Fodder.

A correspondent of the Orange County Farmer has something to say about millet, of which, he remarks, we seldom hear as a feeding crop. His own experience, after a trial of six years, is such that he speaks in the highest terms of it. He could not get grass seed to take, and had to find something to cut his hill for fodder, and discovered that millet did it very satisfactorily, the horses and cows feeding on it in place of hay.

Last season he sowed enough for his stock and so did not feed his millet all out in the fall, having about a ton of it left over until spring. While doing spring work, thinking a change of feed would be beneficial, he thought he would try his seed barn on the millet, though somewhat doubtful whether they would eat it after it had lain in the barn all winter. He was surprised at the result. They ate it and seemed to do as well as better than good hay, and they held their condition with half grain, doing the same work.

For harness dressing and cracked hog's lard and castor oil is recommended; adding the oil to the mixture to give the right consistency. For the wood-work of tools, nothing is better than boiled linseed oil. It preserves it in proper, the wood-work of tools and machinery should be kept well painted. Keresene is very penetrating, and the wood might first be filled with this; it is also excellent to put the gum when running gear gets gummed up. But it must not be wiped off and all with more body be substituted. Castor oil is good for use on a buggy. It is also excellent for harness and for boots and shoes. Some recommend for all kinds of leather three parts of neat's-foot oil and one of fine tallow, applying the oil when it is about as warm as the hand can bear and while the leather is still somewhat moist and pliable after being cleaned in warm water.

Adulteration of Ground Feed.

The adulteration of ground feed which is purchased in large quantities by numerous dairymen is a source of much present complaint. Not that it is a new discovery by any means, but that the patience of purchasers is exhausted and indignation is overflowing. Any time for twenty years past the sawdust question has been discussed, but of late a fresh spdam excites the suffering public.

The trouble is the value of the food decreased by the addition of useless matter, but in some cases the most serious injury results from it. The very common adu'terant is ground spruce, commonly called "spruce." This is heavy and cheap, and is most easily recognized by the shape of the cyrlinders and the color of the grain. It may be detected by the help of an ordinary magnifying glass. Ground white clay and marl are also used for this ill purpose, and to such an extent as sometimes to make up more than one-half of the bulk in the so-called feed. A sample recently examined at the Geneva, N. Y., station gave 40 per cent. of ash, while genuine feed should not have more than 3 or 4 per cent. That kind is also ground up in feed instead of oats, and the light weight of this stuff is equalized by adding the clay and plaster. The ground clay (kaolin) is very destructive, and has every appearance of fine middlings.

There is an easy way to avoid this swindling and loss. Every intelligent and farmer should grow his own feed, which he may do if he has but little of the poor stuff he buys. There is no better feed than corn for cows, and no crop is more easily grown.

Care of the Stallion.

"Rest and fat are the greatest enemies of the horse," is a saying of the Arabs, and it every stallion owner would bear it in mind, as he should, there would be little need to write anything further on this subject. Its observance would be potent to improve the horse in health, strength, virility, endurance and beauty. And by "holding up the glass to nature" correct the irrational treatment and abnormal conditions under which he is often reared. Not that the conditions surrounding the horse in a state of nature always afford the best for they do not all tend to his improvement in the qualities adapted to man's use.

But it is worthy of note that the wild horses are the most perfect in health, and making due allowance for the influence of natural selection or the survival of the fittest, when we observe that he is seldom in a state of rest, that he lives mostly fined in the open air, upon natural food we may reasonably connect these as cause and effect, and that exercise, or exercise, pure air and simple diet is fundamental principles which to build up, by skill in breeding and training, the highest and most perfect equine type.—Breeders' Gazette.

Affected Animals.

If the weather is cold, says the Breeders' Gazette, keep the affected animals indoors in a well-lighted and ventilated stable. Feed on bran mashes with roots and hay, and leave an abundance of pure water at all times within the animal's reach. A little saltpetre, say a teaspoonful, may be dissolved in the drinking water each night until the kidneys act freely. When the throat commences swelling apply warm poultices of linseed meal changing them twice daily, and as soon as the pus in the throat commences to fluctuate, open it and liberate the pus, afterward continuing the poultices till all the swelling and tenderness in the throat has disappeared. Scarcely anything is all the treatment that is necessary in the majority of cases and great difficulty is experienced in swallowing, an ounce each of chlorate of potash, powdered nitre and sal soda to each meal should be mixed in a pint of molasses and a tablespoonful of the mixture given to the horse every three hours.

The Vegetable Paradise.

Last year there were 40,000 acres under cabbages in Moirne and Loire. Peas, tomatoes and French beans are sent in all parts of the world in enormous quantities, and the winter consumption of home is very large. The French are very fond of many of our vegetables in the world and have as early vegetables as those people who live in Italy. The climate and the fact that they cannes the camelia to bloom in February. The coast about Roscoff is especially noted for its "early" vegetables, such as asparagus, onions, haricoll and potatoes. 1,500,000 acres are devoted to the cultivation of vegetables, in Yonne 1 farm gave over 10,000 mirin raised on an acre. These quantities may seem enormous to us, but consider the natural result of the great quantities of concentrated manure and the careful cultivation given them.—New York Telegram.

For the Farmer.

At the Michigan experiment station the best varieties of green corn for succession there prove to be Cory, Crosby, Concord, Stabler and Golden Coin.

From the Connecticut station comes the report that the best way of keeping the best quality are the cheapest source of potash, free from chlorides, to be found is to use wood ashes.

The corn crop of 1890 was the smallest reported in nine years in proportion to the population, as the previous years, as the figures compiled by Statistician Dodge, the reduction is about 30 per cent.

The scale lice on the bark of your fruit trees will soon be active, and when they do be ready for them. Wash the trees with soap and water or use whale-oil soap with ashes. Be sure and do it "on time."

The percentage of the wheat crop of 1890 remaining in the hands of growers is 19 against 20 in the government report, less by 15 per cent than the average of the previous 10 years and less by 22 per cent than the average following the crop of 1884.

Any cultivation which distimbs the fine roots of growing plants is an injury. Deep cultivation is therefore. After the roots have spread through the soil, a good dressing of manure applies to everything that you grow. Clean shallow culture, and plenty of it, should be the rule.

It is always profitable for the farmer to have a good flock of fowls on the place, but with these, just as with any other live stock, it is the best and that pay best. Blooded fowls and poor ones will not be apt to run side by side in the same line, and one will pay as well in proportion for the increased cost as the other.

One remedy to prevent squirrels, mice and birds finding planted corn, is to harrow the ground immediately after planting to cover the plainer tracks, and then to scatter corn in every the border of the fields and in the vicinity of the squirrel holes as soon as the corn begins to come up.

The creamery system is to be recommended because it so largely reduces the drudgery of woman's work on the farm. Churning and managing the cream and butter are hard work, and demand a good deal of time when done properly. Creameries should be as plentiful as school houses, and private dairies consigned to sparsely set tled regions.

"Perhaps you think it is an easy thing to steer a fire truck; so it is—when you know how," said a gray-haired little laddie the other day, as he nimbly mounted and took his lofty seat on the tail of the truck after returning from a false alarm a few blocks away.

"There are practically two men on the truck. He who drives and he who sits sitting on a high seat in front. The members of the company find standing room on the big platform which runs along either side of the truck be low the body of the conveyance, while at the rear end is a small platform and up in the air. You scarcely see the driver because he looks at the street and his conductor at the other end. The latter has his hand on a big wheel like an enormous one on a buggy or car, on which he keeps his hands firmly set. Meanwhile his eyes are on all the driver. He sees the driver turn a corner, and he is ready in an instant. He knows just when to put on his hand brawny and steady the unwieldy machine. He is trained to look at a lamp post or even into a building in a twinkling.

"But the steerer knows his business At just the critical moment he turns his iron wheel this way or that way. The driver has only to drive and to steer, but in some way the duties are apt to develop upon the most competent in the second, and so it is that one man comes to do the same work year after year, and very seldom can be found him a reputation for his specialty. Beginners are taught their duties in small detail, by beginning the lessons on the returns from fires, and little by little learn skill from experience.—New York News.

Sam is elated over his success in producing such fine berries, and says "there's millions in it" in raising them.

Thos. Phillip's residence at the corner of Eighth and Maple streets, was discovered to be on fire about 3 a. m. on Wednesday morning. The alarm was given and the department soon appeared, and it was supposed, extinguished the flames, which were in the second story. Fire was again discovered about 6 o'clock in the morning, and it was again necessary to call out the department to subdue the flames. It is not known how the fire originated but it probably was from a defective flue. The damage was about $250, fully covered by insurance.

Another place where gambling was in progress was pulled by the police on Wednesday night, and five arrests were made, and the prisoners lodged in the lock-up, to be released some time later on their own recognizance. On the following morning a plea of guilty was entered, and they were fined $5 each, which was paid. These arrests following so closely on the raiding of two rooms last week clearly indicates that Mayor Hagberg is in earnest in his efforts to suppress this form of vice, which has hitherto been winked at by former administrations. There can be no complaint of unfairness on the mayor's part, as he gave ample warning on first taking office, that gambling must be stopped.

King Fun Makers.

The king fun makers of the theatrical world, Rentfrow's Jolly Pathfinders, have played to average size houses at the opera house this week. On the opening night the house was crowded, nearly every seat being occupied. The company is a strong one, composed of people all well known as first-class actors in the vaudeville world, and if hard work is an indication, they deserve to please. They certainly are deserving of a more liberal patronage considering the low prices of admission. They will give three more performances, to-night, to-morrow night and Saturday matinee. At the matinee a beautiful doll will be given away, besides a package of candy to every child present. Admission, children 10 cents, adults 20 cents. To-morrow night a fine gasoline stove, and an antique oak refrigerator will be presented to the holder of the lucky number. Don't fail to attend and draw the prize, and enjoy a hearty laugh.

Third Street Row.

On Monday night Claude Crowley, the mistress of one of the houses of ill-fame on Third street, became intoxicated, and while in that condition got into a quarrel with Fannie Grant, an inmate of her house, which resulted in the Crowley woman striking her opponent over the head with a stove poker with such force as to fracture the skull and inflict a dangerous scalp wound. Dr. Groves was called, who sewed up the scalp wound, not however, until the woman was very weak from the loss of blood. She will probably recover from the effects of the blow. Her assailant was up before his honor, Judge Chiperfield, on Tuesday, charged with assault. On being found guilty, she was sentenced to pay a fine of $30, or lay in jail 40 days. Having the necessary cash she deposited $30 and went on her way rejoicing.

Rev. Frizzell's Resignation Accepted.

Rev. J. W. Frizzell, of the First Congregational church, is at present spending his annual 30 day's vacation on the Pacific Coast. Before leaving for the west Mr. Frizzell sent in his resignation as pastor of the church, to take effect in three months, which was read in church the following Sunday by Rev. Knudson, who temporarily fills the pulpit. On Thursday evening of last week a church meeting was held and the pastor's resignation accepted. Mr. Frizzell is a young minister of more than ordinary ability, and although exceedingly blunt and outspoken in his condemnation of what he conceived to be wrong in the members of his flock, which made him some very determined enemies, yet he was generally beloved by a large majority of the congregation, who are greatly grieved at his intended departure. He has not as yet accepted a church elsewhere.

They Were Convicted.

On Saturday Wm. Paine, Jr., by authority of A. F. Ferris, member of the state fish commission, arrested and brought to this city two men, who gave their names as Fred Cool and Sherman Chambers, for violating the game law by seining for bass and pickerel in Cullen Lake. Mr. Paine arrested them as they came on shore with the wet seine and fish they had captured. The men tried to explain their action by claiming that they were seining for white fish, but witnesses were produced who testified to the entire absence of white fish in this lake, so the story would not go down. They were found guilty and fined $25 and costs or 30 days in jail. Their conviction will have a most wholesome effect on the numerous sharps who have for several years past been catching fish in this manner contrary to law. Mr. Ferris, as a member of the commison, says that he proposes to see the law enforced, and unlawful fishing prohibited, and intimated that other arrests would follow. This is eminently wise and proper, as a few more years of this work would entirely deplete our lakes of the finny tribe to enrich a few sordid speculators, and destroy one of the finest and most wholesome sports, and a source of pleasure and profit to our citizens.

Memorial.

Entered into rest on Wednesday, June 10th, 1891, William Phinney Spalding, Junior Warden of St. Paul's Church, Brainerd, Minn., aged 67 years, 7 months, and 9 days.

By the death of Capt. Spalding, St. Paul's Church has been called to part with one of her oldest, truest, and most faithful officers and members. Identified with the parish from the time of its organization in 1872, he was always to be found at his post of duty, a loyal soldier of the Cross of Christ.

During all these years, as occasion required, he rendered efficient service as lay-reader, Sunday School superintendent, vestryman, and warden.

Quiet, unobtrusive, gentle and courteous in his demeanor; firm in his adherence to truth and duty; a just and upright man; a useful and esteemed citizen; a loyal friend; a devoted husband and father; a consistent Church man; he exerted an influence which was potent for good in the community and Church.

His battle of life is ended; he "fought a good fight;" he "kept the faith;" and we doubt not "there is laid up for him a crown of righteousness."

To us who remain he has left a character to be emulated, and a memory to be revered.

In token of our affection and esteem for our departed brother, this memorial will be spread upon the records of the vestry.
