CANCER CURED —AND A— LIFE SAVED

By the Persistent Use of

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

"I was troubled for years with a sore on my knee, which several physicians, who treated me, called a cancer, assuring me that nothing could be done to save my life. As a last resort, I was induced to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and, after taking a number of bottles, the sore began to disappear and my general health improve. I persisted in this treatment, until the sore was entirely healed. Since then, I use Ayer's Sarsaparilla occasionally as a tonic and blood-purifier, and, indeed, it seems as though I could not keep house without it."—Mrs. S. A. Fields, Bloomfield, Ia.

AN STORY TO TELL.

A Beggar Is of but Little Account to an Interviewer.

I must say that his statement of his own case is usually incoherent, and sometimes even a little fabulous. The poor fellows have very little imagination or invention; they might almost as well be realistic novelists as not. I find that those who strike me for a night's lodging, when they stop me in the street at night, come as a rule from Pittsburg, are from coal districts, or some sort; the last one said he was a puddler. "A skilled mechanic," he explained—"what is called a skilled mechanic"; and, of course he was duly watching for some chance to get back to Pittsburg, though there was no chance of work, from what he said, even after he got there. On the other hand, I find that most of those who ask by day for money to get a dinner are from Philadelphia, or rural parts of Eastern Pennsylvania, though within this week I have extended hospitality (I think is the right phrase) to two architectural draughtsmen from Boston. They were both entirely decent-looking, sober-looking young men, who gave like cases of starvation, and they each gratefully accepted a quarter from me. I do not attempt to account for them, for they made no attempt to account for themselves; and I think the effect was more artistic so.

I am rarely approached by any professed New Yorker, which perhaps is a proof of the superior industry or prosperity of our city; but now and then a fellow-citizen who has fallen asks me for money in the street, and perhaps goes straight and spends it for drink. Drink, however, is as necessary in some forms as food itself, and a rich, generous port wine is often prescribed for invalids. These men, without exception, look like invalids, and I have no doubt that they prefer to buy a rich, generous port to that which gave them money enough. I never do that, though I have a means of mulcting alms seem generally to myself—at least, by practicing a little cordiality with the poor fellows. I do not give grudgingly or slightly, but I say, if I give at all, when they ask me, "Why, of course!" or "Yes, certainly!" and sometimes I have to invite them to use their feelings more or less freely in my behalf, and tell how they wish me to think that they have come to the sad pass of begging. This is amusing to flatter them, and it makes me feel much better, which is certainly my motive for doing it.

Now and then they will offer me some apology for begging, in a tone that says, "I know how it is myself," and once there was one who began by saying, "I know it's a shame for a strong man like me to be begging, but—" They seldom have any devices for working me, beyond the simple sentiment of their misery, though there was a case in which I helped a poor fellow raise a mortgage upon a postal order, which he then kept as a pledge of my good faith. Their main reliance seems to be upon pencils, which they have in all inferior variety. I find that they can't use it kindly if you do not want any change back when you have given them a coin worth more than they asked for the pencil, and that they will even let you off without taking the pencil after you have bought it. In the end you have to use some means to rid yourself from the accumulation of pencils, unless you are willing to burn them for kindling wood, and I find the simplest way is not to take them after you have paid for them. It is amusing how quickly you can establish a comity with these pencil people; they will not only let you leave your pencils with them, but they will sometimes excuse you from buying, if you remind them that you have bought of them lately. Then, if they do not remember you, they at least smile politely and pretend to do so.—W. D. Howells, in the June Century.

The grocer sends the new tgrand of baking powder simply because it costs him so much less and he can make more profit by selling it than he can on the Royal. The Royal is made from the very finest materials and costs much more than any other brand, which accounts for its superiority, although it is sold to consumer at the same price.

How to Wash Flannels.

Three things are enemies of flannels; hot irons, hot water, and the rubbing on of soap; when these three things it is that shrink, full and discolor flannels. Look the garments over and rub soap on soiled spots before washing. Make a warm suds, and add a tablespoonful of ammonia to a gallon of water. Squeeze the garments with the hands, but never rub them, least of all upon the board—put that out of temptation's way. Rinse in water of the same temperature as the first, till clean. If colored, add white vinegar to the last water, to set the color. After wringing shake well and shape into proper form, and carefully pulling them into shape as they dry. The worsted, silk, cotton and mixed tights should be stretched as nearly as possible, to restore them to their natural close fit, and the parts at the knees and ankle at the elbows can be pulled out. Take the garments when while still damp, and press with a warm iron—never hot—till perfectly dry. In this way old flannels can be as soft and comfortable to wear as new ones.—Demorest's Monthly.

A Strange Cremation.

One of the strangest coffins ever t.'s of is that for which the British wa department is said to be responsible. The story is that a workman engaged in casting metal for the manufacture of ordnance at the Woolwich arsenal lost his balance and fell into a caldron containing the tons of molten metal. The metal was at white heat, and the man was utterly consumed in less time than it takes to tell of it. The war department authorities held a conference, and decided not to profane the dead by using the metal in the manufacture of ordnance, and that a piece of metal was actually buried, and a Church of England clergyman read the service for the dead over it.—New York Tribune.

Few things clean varnished or oiled woodwork in a house better than h rose-rubbed in thoroughly with a soft linen cloth. Crude petroleum and linseed oil in the proportion of one-third of the petroleum to two-thirds of the oil are also good for polishing and cleaning such woodwork, as well as hardwood furniture. If very much soiled, it is well to wipe both woodwork and furniture with a flannel cloth wrung out of warm water; wipe dry quickly and use the oil. If the result is to be as good as in any cleaning or polishing process, the rubbing must be with the grain of the wood, and the application must be so thoroughly rubbed in the wood that it will not remain a greasy, sticky substance on the surface ready to impress every particle of dust that settles.

The Silverton Secret

By CHARLOTTE BRAEME. (Author of Dora Thorne).

Her keen eyes were on the alert, however; if anything was to be discovered, she was determined to come upon it.

"Do you expect many guests to-night besides those staying in the house?" she asked Lord Lilburne some time later as the company began to disperse and dress for dinner.

"Yes, a great number," was the reply. "By the way, Grace," he added, turning to his daughter, "did I tell you that Lord Rolando Vyner, wrote to me to say he is coming to-night?"

Lord Rolando! repeated Grace in dismay.

"Yes; I wrote to invite him to dinner. He says he cannot come till later in the evening, but he will come."

"Did he say nothing else?" asked the daughter hoarsely.

"Yes; he did say something else, but it's of no consequence—at least, no consequence to you," and his lordship turned away.

Grace ached no more. She was benumbed to feel like a creature at bay, hunted on every side, with no avenue of escape open to her.

Why did her father invite Lord Roland Ayre, and why, above all things, had the invitation been accepted?

After a time, however, consternation gave place to mirth, and Grace laughed bitterly as she remarked to Sir Victor:

"Your cousin gives a striking proof of his consideration for me. Even when he went away he said he would never enter Silverton Castle again, and loss he brought Kate with him, or me to pass her."

"And how do you know that he won't bring Kate with him?" asked Miriam Hindman boldly.

Grace looked at her for one moment in silence, then, turning her head away without deigning to utter one word of reply.

"Surely you don not think of marrying that horrid girl," Grace exclaimed, turning to Sir Victor and to Miriam talking together in a confidential and affectionate manner.

"I certainly do not," he said, "but the chance," returned Sir Victor; "she's an extremely nice girl."

"Oh, yes, I know you think there is something in her," sneered Grace.

"At any rate, I shall not be here," retorted the young man, angrily. "I shall not trouble myself to see what it is my father's house," she replied; "and I wonder, since you are always her so much, you don't marry her."

"I am not quite fool enough for that," he replied, with a short, harsh laugh, coldly.

Then he crossed the room and joined the couple of whom they had been speaking.

Grace was very angry, but she did not follow him, and soon after this the party sang wonderful—but that it was time to dress for dinner.

Miriam Hindman, instead of going up stairs like the other girls, seated herself into a little study she knew of, where she could be turned to be polished grate, and the lamp was turned low.

Despite her assumption of cheerfulness and high spirits, her heart was sad and heavy.

Sir Victor Gaylord had been the cause of her life, and, though she had parted in pique and anger more than a year ago, and just before her father had lost the greater part of his fortune, she had always expected her distant lover to return to her.

But this hope had died out now, for he was pledged to become the husband of another before twenty-four hours had passed.

She had seated herself on a hassock before the fire, her hands clasping her head, and her elbows resting on her knees, and she was thinking of the beautiful of the man whom she still loved so well.

"He will have a very miserable life," she mused, "particularly as if Grace does not get the large fortune she anticipates, and he will, no doubt, often think of me and wish he had not taken me at my word when I told him to go and find a richer wife, and me! people think me bright and witty, and sometimes I am one, and girls envy me, and yet I am the most miserable woman in this house to-night—yes, quite the most miserable."

Her meditations were here interrupted by an arm being clasped round her waist and by some member of the opposite sex very energetically kissing her.

She looked up, struggled to her feet, and, recognizing her companion, she exclaimed, passionately

"Victor, how dare you insult me like this?"

"I only kissed you under the mistletoe," he replied, with good humility, holding up a spray of the white-berried leaf, and

"Under the mistletoe!" she exclaimed, with increasing anger. "I wonder if any girl ever listened to such a lie face. I wonder you dare to come into my room when I am alone."

"Well, it is a risky thing to do," he replied recklessly, "but I wanted to speak to you, and I may not have another chance."

"That is highly probable. What have you to say?"

"I want to know why you came here?"

"I came because I was invited," was the haughty reply.

"You had some other reason," he persisted.

"I had two or three other reasons," she replied with a short laugh.

"You set me on fire to make me feel what a fool I'd been to think of marrying that waxen-faced doll while you were free."

"Oh, dear, no! I am not so vain; besides, you are going to marry Kate. But, since you are so curious, I don't mind telling you that I came to-night in the hope of meeting Kate Lilburne to-night."

"Kate Lilburne!" he repeated, incredulously. "Are you out of your mind? There is no such person living as Kate Lilburne."

"Well, perhaps she is married and has changed her name, still she must have lost her identity."

"And you really came here hoping to meet Kate and not me?" he asked suddenly as he stepped close to her side?"

"Why should I want to see you?" she asked defiantly. "You are nothing to me."

"And yet, you are all the world to me. Miriah—my love, my life. Only say the word and we will fly together, and I will break the false promise that bind me to Grace, whom I have learned to hate."

He caught her in his arms and kissed her passionately, and she gasped faintly though firmly released herself from his embrace, as she said:

"It is too late, Victor, too late. I have no pity for Grace, but I cannot bring such a blot upon the name upon her father. No; you must keep your word and marry her; but I am sorry for you, for I am sure you will be miserable."

She slipped away from him as she said this, and ran upstairs, but on reaching her own room she drew aside the curtain, as a species of self-mortification, she would go into Kate's room with the other girls and be civil to her young hostess.

Many of the bridesmaids had clustered around the expectant bride, and took a great interest in the dress she was to wear on the day the last evening when she would sit at the head of her father's table as the mistress of his household, and they admired over and over again the handsome ornaments with which she had been provided.

"You don't seem to have much jewelry," remarked Miriam Hindman. "I wish I had known it before, for I would have given you a bracelet as a wedding present instead of the silver dishes I brought with me. But I suppose your father will give you Kate's jewels, she had a splendid collection, I know."

"Kate's jewels will go with her money to her mother's family, when there is proof that she is really dead, for people talk a great deal to my father as they did this afternoon it is not likely that anything reasonable will convince him," replied Grace, severely.

"I don't know why you should call it 'stuff,'" returned Miriam, quietly; "people don't disappear as your sister did unless they go away to return at some time or other, or unless they are murdered. Therefore, until it is proved that she is dead, we may reasonably hope she is alive."

Grace shrugged her shoulders.

She would not discuss the matter, but believed that it was time they should begin to dress, and her guild would be ready to attend her when the girls all went off to their own rooms.

How very horrid Miriam is in her manner to Kate," remarked Lizzie Goulburne to her sister, as they were dressing together with the help of one maid; "she seems to do all she can to spite her."

"Yes," replied Amy; "but I don't wonder at all; I can only surprised at her being so civil to her."

"Why?"

"I wonder she cared to come to the wedding of the man she was engaged to herself, and I am not surprised at her constantly referring to the help of Kate Lilburne, for Kate and she were chums before, and they say you must be that the way in which Grace tries to forget that she was the favorite fiancee to those who hope. If they do not believe, otherwise.

"I believe some you are right; and I don't think it would take much to win Sir Victor back from Grace."

"So little that I would not risk a pair of new dresses on the chance of wearing those costly gowns to-morrow."

And she pointed to the two bridesmaids' costumes that lay spread out on the counterpane.

"We shall keep them in any case," laughed Lizzie; "and they will serve us for evening dresses for the rest of the winter. After all, lockers-on see most of the game."

"They see it, but they don't take part in it," said Amy, and the two girls like you and me seem to have no chance of ever being anything but lookers-on."

Other people soon trooped in, however, and very soon the Goulburne girls found themselves unfashionably sought after, despite their plain attire. The rivals of the evening however were the bride-elect and her chief bridesmaid. Miriam Hindman, Grace would have said in pale blue, exquisitely trimmed with cream lace and blush-roses, and she looked like her gold ornaments, and her bright eyes made her look bewitching in the extreme.

But her beauty was quite eclipsed when Miriam descended.

The brunette wore rose-colored satin, but covered with a black lace looped with lilies-of-the-valley, white pearls and diamonds were clasped around her throat, and pearl and diamonds shone in her jet black hair.

Independent of ornament, Miriam was wonderfully attractive, for her rich colors and sparkling gems added very much to her natural charms, and she looked triumphant as she felt that she thankful she had been born too late to be presented at the court before her gowns, short in the waist and tied round with a sash, until the time when the sleeves are inserted.

"It was almost enough to drive a girl to madness to see that man with her, if only to obtain the privilege of wearing the pink and white," she would say laughingly. Happily for her, no one can wear what we like without caring for the opinion of the male sex this evening, however, and he for one was thinking of nothing but his host's daughter was fixed for the following morning. She knew better than to be unable to resist the attraction of Miriam's black eyes.

Grace watched the couple jealously whenever she thought of them; but sometimes she was obliged to turn her temporary defection of her lover filled her thoughts. She was planning how to get even with him for his treachery and stay long enough to be able to reproach him with it, when she saw the dark shaft into which she had fortune fell.

"I shall have no opportunity after to-night," she thought gloomily, "for he will go away. I shall never see him or me the whole time until I go to church, and after that I shall go away with Victor.

"Yes, it must be to-night. When the captives engaged the time into the ball to play their tricks I shall slip away. I shall be less missed then than at any time."

She smiled as she came to this conclusion, and then was a sudden motion which a gentleman at her side had asked.

CHAPTER VI

What Grace Saw at the Bottom of the Shaft.

The tables had been cleared away, the guests had returned to the ball-room, and the dancing had been going on for nearly a couple of hours, when the band ceased playing and a company of conjurers and jugglers, specially engaged for the occasion, made their appearance.

All the lights were lowered and the large party of guests seated themselves in a half-circle round the performers.

The best this evening was more than restless, he was nervous and excited, and as the minutes and the hours went on he seemed to find it a relief to turn his eyes from the door.

"Are you expecting any one, papa?" Grace had asked him more than once as she observed his singular manner.

"Yes—I don't know," he replied impatiently; "don't mind me; go and amuse yourself."

And he turned away as though anxious to stop questioning.

Grace was too much troubled with her own perplexities to pay much heed to her father, but when the conjurers commenced their tricks and she believed all eyes were turned upon them she rose from her seat and quietly left the room.

She had made all her preparations.

The previous year she had sold her dainty clothes and jewels, neglected how Lord Roland had looked at her as he pointed out the stain.

Now she was more prudent.

She hastily buttoned on a dark ulster that completely covered her pale blue gown and otherwise protected herself against the cold, for she recollected that the path with a shelter, and the wind, rushing up from the dark apertures, had seemed to strike her with its icy breath and chill her to the very bone.

There was no snow on the ground this year; it was a green Yule-tide, and old people talked of strange being a full churchyard, while others, more hopeful and less prone to take a gloomy view of matters, said there was frost in the air, and before New Year's day there would be skating on the river and lakes.

With her service strung with a nameless fear to the horrible task before her, Grace Lilburne went swiftly to the chamber which, a year ago this very night, had been the scene of such a cruel tragedy.

It was not until she had lighted the lantern and fastened the door behind her, and she felt herself quite alone, with the consciousness that her victim was lying so many feet below on the spot on which she stood, that her courage wavered, and for a few seconds she felt that she could not look upon the face of the dead.

But while fear wrestled her resolution, a horrible fascination seemed to draw her on with irresistible power to complete the purpose which brought her here, and she found herself beyond all doubt that Miriam Hindman's hints and suggestions meant nothing more than a desire to annoy her and make her uncomfortable.

SHELLEY AND BYRON.

Some Very Frank Letters Showing Their Relations.

Some letters from Shelley to Leigh Hunt have just been privately printed in England, and among them are a few fitfully showing glimpses of the poet and essayist. It is said that these new letters are particularly illuminating as to Shelley's relation with Byron. There are some extracts in a broad-minded fashion, but not in which bear upon this point.

"Meanwhile, let my last letters, as far as they regard Lord Byron, be as if they had not been written. Part from me entirely, my brother. I should say, particular dispositions, in which I am overpowered by Lord Byron's close and exclusive intimacy with him is which I find myself intolerable to me. Nothing, my best friend, will confess and confide to you. No feeling of pain or pleasure or interfere with what is now nearest to your heart. Nothing will I ever care to preserve the little influence I may have over this Proteus in whom I have reposed the most sanguine of the wounds.

"I said what I thought with regard to Lord Byron, nor would I have breathed a whisper of my feelings to any ear but yours; but with you I would and I now think should act. I hope time has corrected me, and I am sorry to learn from a formerly condemned, misanthropical and unprecious. If so, do you cure me; nor should I have been unwilling to the medicine of such diseases I may suffer, that time have been corrected; and how deep the wounds have been you partly know and partly can conjecture, and that Lord Byron has made me bitterly feel the inferiority which the world has presumed to place between us, and which, subsists nowhere but in our own talents, which are not our own, but nature's; or in our rank, which is not our own, but fortune's."—Philadelphia Press.

BEFORE DR. DEPEW WAS BALD.

How the Railroad President Looked Nearly Forty Years Ago.

When Chauncey M. Depew was graduated from Yale College, says the New York Press, he wore flowing side whiskers and had an abundant supply of hair on his head, which was brushed, with graceful carelessness, into a curl at the left side of his forehead down over the right eye. His face then presented a decidedly ministerial aspect. Yet his thoughts and ambitions were not then focused upon the pulpit but upon the bar. Mr. Depew's appearance when he began the study of the law in 1857 is faithfully depicted in the picture here given.

A HORSE AND A MULE.

Proposition to Join a Gas and a Steam Engine Together.

Referring to the discussion of the gas engine question, a prominent engineer remarked in conversation that he failed to see why the gas engine and the steam engine should not be combined, so to speak.

He put the case something in this manner: In the gas engine one of the problems is to keep the cylinder reasonably cool, and in the steam engine to keep the cylinder hot. Why not connect them by having a gas engine running and jacket its cylinder with water, which in turn is used for boiling the water, thus saving the heat which is now thrown away. In this way the exhaust from the gas engine through the jacket of the steam cylinder, and, connected with the latter, would add a heating chamber for the steam to pass through before entering into the cylinder, so that more heating surface could be employed.

Gas engines are adapted to each other would probably mean a relative increase in power, a cram, inaccuracy, and a crowd. The dwellers of Mulberry Bend, themselves wont to be acquainted with poverty, gave of their few copper coins to her, who sat wailing Italian ruins at her waist. They helped her to pick up such of them in the direction of Mulberry Bend. At last, returned through that quarter he saw a hundred yards in front of him a woman with a tray of images on her head. He quickened his pace and soon was near her. It was the same Italian; she had replenished her tray with more saints and less angels, and was in full tide of business. One perishes, another is born.

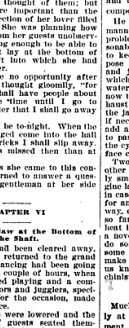
Just then, swaggering around a corner, appeared the former breaker of images, and again, as if on purpose, he swung his arm rudely against the woman. A crash, a cram, lamentation, and a crowd. The dwellers of Mulberry Bend, themselves wont to be acquainted with poverty, gave of their few copper coins to her, who sat wailing Italian ruins at her waist. They helped her to pick up such of



Why Shelley Was Not Invited.

Shelley had made all his preparations to go to Italy, and was waiting for a favorable wind, when he received a letter from Byron, inviting him to visit him at Pisa. Shelley replied that he would be glad to do so, but that he was afraid that Byron's friends would object to his visiting him. Byron answered that he was living entirely alone, and that he would be glad to see Shelley for a few days. Shelley then wrote to Byron, saying that he would be glad to visit him

Much interest is being manifested in the coming tournament which occurs on Thursday and Friday of next week, June 27th and 28th, and Secretary Mantor is in receipt of communications from shooters in various parts of the Northwest regarding it, the probabilities being that it will be the most largely attended and most successful of any held in Minnesota this year.

The Jeffersons.

On Saturday evening the Jefferson Dramatic Club will present "Caprice" at the Sleeper opera house, and from present indications every seat will be occupied on that occasion, as the tickets are going rapidly. Those who have tickets should get them reserved at the McFadden Drug Co.'s store at once. The entertainment will be in every way worthy the patronage of our citizens and none can afford to miss it. The curtain will not rise until 9 o'clock in order to give all a chance to transact their usual Saturday evening business and still be in time for the beginning of the first act. If you are not already in possession of a ticket buy one at once.

Gets a Canoe and a Man.

W. L. Hilgedick, the St. Paul man who is taking the census of northern Cass county will be right in it from this on, according to the following:

Hilgedick claims to be having a very hard time of it and asks Secretary Berg to be allowed to purchase a canoe and hire a man to paddle it. He says that there are only winter roads through that part of the county and that in summer all travelling is done in canoes. Mr. Berg made some inquiries in regard to the matter and as a result sent a letter to the gentleman instructing him that his request had been granted and that the bureau would allow him expenses for a canoe and a man to operate it.

Steamboat on Leech Lake.

A correspondent writes the Minneapolis Journal from Lothrop that the steamer Mohawk, purchased by J. J. Frost from the owners on Gull lake, was launched on Sunday last and she is chartered for freight and passenger service. This is the first steamboat on Leech lake, and any point on the lake can be reached with comfort and safety. The application of steam opens up grand possibilities for the settlement of this beautiful country, as heretofore Leech lake with its 400 miles of shore, offered serious obstacles to the settlement of lands lying on the south shore of the lake. As a pleasure resort Leech lake is destined to far surpass any lake in the northwest.

The laying of steel on the extension of the Brainerd & Northern Minnesota railroad from Lothrop to the south shore of Leech lake commenced Tuesday with Roadmaster John Shores in charge, and one mile of steel a day will be laid.

Garrison News Items.

Great preparations are being made here for the celebration of the Fourth, which will take place at J. F. Dykeman's. The Literary Society have an excellent programme and other choice features will be presented, among which will be a ball game and a grand dance in the evening.

Your correspondent would call the attention of the county commissioners to the fact that in one or two instances they have been imposed upon by people from this vicinity who applied and received aid from the county while the said parties were able to take care of themselves and their families, in fact, were able to buy quite a quantity of stock at the time aid was given. Such men should be sent to the poor farm instead of being encouraged in their efforts to make the tax-payers support them. U. N. O.

By so doing many of the following notable resorts may be visited without additional expense. Chautauqua Lake, Niagara Falls, Thousand Islands, Rapids of the St. Lawrence, Saratoga, Palisades of the Hudson and the Hoosac Tunnel. The Ocean Twelve.

One of the most brilliant ideas which this century has produced is now suggested by a Yankee, who has found that crossing the Atlantic in the ordinary way by boat does not agree with him. Whether it is practicable or not time alone will show. Briefly his proposition is to span the Atlantic with a trolley rope. "To sit looking out of your cab window far above the surface of the raging and impotent sea, skipping along at electric speed and daring the waves to do their worst—that would be bliss." Owing to the curvature of the earth's surface it would be impossible under any circumstances to do without supports, and supports, in the ordinary sense of the word, would be out of the question. It is manifest that there is only one plan by which such a wire could be carried. The two ends must be fastened, one in London and the other in New York, while from coast to coast two lines of balloons could be stationed of sufficient strength to keep the wire raised as far above the level of the sea as you require. To the outer end of the wire it is not apparent what would keep the balloons from blowing away in the midst of a raging storm. To the originator, however, this is simple enough. "The trolley would, of course."—New York Dispatch.

Women and Fishing.

Shocking it is to be compelled to state that many fishing superstitions are regallantly directed against the ladies. Over against Ross there is the island of Lewis, 60 miles in length. In this lake there is but one fresh river. "Fish abound there in very great plenty," but only let a woman wade in the stream, and not a solitary will be seen there for at least 12 months. There is a song about "Elisa's Tootsies," but that immortal lyric does not explain why they should frighten the fish. I believe the ladies deny the allegation in toto. In the south of Ireland an angler proceeding to fish declares that he will have no luck if he is asked where he is going to, if he sees a magpie or "if he is so unfortunate as to meet a woman."—London Fishing Gazette.

Smoke Cigarettes Now.

He regarded himself as very English, and he certainly was very young. He fancied that he cut an imposing figure as he sauntered past the theater just as the matinee girls emerged on the street. But a large, coarse man who was going by spoiled it all by remarking in a loud voice:

"Hello, Willie! What are you going to do with that pipe? Going to blow soap bubbles?"

And now there is one more young man in Buffalo who will never again smoke a pipe on the street.—Buffalo Express.

Dust In One's Eyes.

To "cast dust in one's eyes" perfectly explains itself. It is, however, interesting to know that Epaminondas at the battle of Tegea defeated the Spartans by masking his movements with a large body of cavalry. He caused the horsemen to gallop to and fro in front of the enemy in such a way as to raise a cloud of dust and so veiled the movements of his infantry and enabled them to take up a more advantageous position.

Mayor's Proclamation.

Notice is hereby given, that Ordinance No. 68, relating to Obstructions in Streets, Alleys, Sidewalks and to Prevent Injurious, Dangerous and Unlawful Practices in the Same," will be strictly enforced from the date of this notice.

It is desired that every citizen read the entire ordinance carefully, and govern himself accordingly.

Particularly attention is called to the second paragraph of Section 1:

"No person shall place, leave, throw, drop or scatter any stones, bricks, mortar, earth, wood, shavings, dirt, garbage, rubbish or any other material or obstruction in or upon any street, sidewalk or public ground in said city."

The penalty for violating, or offending against, or failing to comply with, any of the provisions of this ordinance, is a fine not exceeding $50 or imprisonment each fine is paid, not exceeding sixty days.
