

A MATTER

OF SKILL.

By BRATICE WHITTY.

"I should like to hear what he said," Miss Elliott was of a placid disposition; though she formed her own opinions and presented them, yet she was always ready to comply with the wishes of her companion.

"He didn't say much," she said. "From behind these same ironed and loaded words, of which I'm sure," she added, "he is 'arting' the poor old fellow."

"You're right," she said, "but I had asked him to look at the picture and he had promised to do so. When you did not arrive, he went down to the Memorial Hall, the conductor, the driver, the porter, the man that you had asked to look at the picture, and he had promised to do so. When you did not arrive, he went down to the Memorial Hall, the conductor, the driver, the porter, the man that you had asked to look at the picture, and he had promised to do so."

"I have not enjoyed an evening so much as this," she said, "and I have enjoyed the stars on their way down. It was very nice to see you come to me last night, though I am sure you were not alone. I am sure you had an old woman for your companion, and she was very nice to me. I am sure you had an old woman for your companion, and she was very nice to me."
