Due Notice .- As we have adopted Due Norice.—As we have adopted the plan of paying our expenses as we go, and considering the sad fact that the $3.75 that we collected two weeks ago is rapidly becoming exhausted in carrying out that principle, we give those induted to us due and timely notice that within a very few days w shall start out on another collectin rampage, and we have an ambition t rampage, and we have an ambition to increase our exchequer this heat to as much as $4.00 if possible. So, instead of getting any "old stories" ready for our coming, just be kind enough to substitute the "old yarn." with the "pewter."

To Leave Us.—We are sorry to know that our good friend, Dr. C. P. Thayer and wife, are to leave our city and return to Burlington. Vermont, their old home, where they intend spending the winter. Our town will feel the vacancy occasioned by the departure of the Doctor and his citizable wife as the second cestimable wife, as they have long formed a part and parcel of our best circles of society—and here, as in all new communities, we have none of such to spare, but 'lots of room' for more. #### THE VILLAGE ANGEL.

Emily Wharton was the pet and pride of Riverdale. The old men reverently called her the "village angel," the young men admired her by day and dreamed of her by might; and even her companions of her own sex felt for tain of envy or risolonsy. Had any one saked if she was beautiful, the reply would have been: "The sure I don't know; but she is so good we all love her; we can't help it." And if you, reader, had seen her, no time could efface the memory of her glossy brown the country of the gray, and her fair, round face with gray, and her fair, round face with gray, and her fair, round face with gray in the same property of the same should have to admit that she possessed charms superior to those of personal leveliness.

Intel of romance there had was all this of romance there had was failly a quietly happy life, she had made herself, while quietly working for quite another object. Her parents being the wealthiest people in town, and her own heat prompting her to take the most worthy advantage on this blessing, she had often helped Emily Wharton was the pet and ride of Riverdale.
