

THE YOUNG CUBAN.

One evening, just after the eight o'clock gun had fired, I was seated in the Cafe Fernando, in the Calle de Santa Maria, Havana, smoking a Spanish cigar, and watching the crowd of persons passing in and out, or pacing up and down the hall, in that earnest, conversational manner which characterizes the Spaniard.

"I forgot it and did not feel it, until now remained of it," answered Pedro; "but now that I have thought of it, I understand. De Armas made me take off my coat, and upon examination he found that the sword passed through the flesh of my left shoulder, making two orifices of the breadth of two inches, and that the wound bled freely. It was soon bound by the skillful Pedro, who had been in the wars and had experience in such matters, which it seemed to afford him great delight to have to do with again. De Armas, having seen me safely in bed, in a small closet, half hidden by a pile of tobacco boxes, took leave of me, promising to come and see me the next day, and report how affairs stood.
