

Regular Case of Lightning Stroke.

A paper was read at a meeting of the Clinical Society, London, by Dr. G. W. Wille, of Ashford, of a case of lightning stroke. A farm laborer was struck by lightning on the 15th of June, under a living tree, close to the window of a shed in which this fellow-workman had just been sheltering from a violent storm of rain. His companions found the man partly dead and the bark and the patient's clothes standing at his feet. The patient himself was lying on his back, his face livid, and though he was fully conscious previously, he was now motionless, his eyes rolling on their sockets, his mouth open, and his hands clenched. He was unconscious, but his heart, and his lungs, and his stomach, the feet were warm, and his hands were cold. The feet were warm and his hands were cold. The feet were warm and his hands were cold.

An Incident of the War.

On a raw, foggy afternoon in the winter of 1862, a General's private secretary had an appointment with President Lincoln on business connected with the capture of the fort of Mifflin. As we were about to take the train, the private secretary of the President, Mr. Lincoln, who was a young man of about 30, and who was a member of the same family as the President, was standing at the door of the White House, and he was looking at his watch. He was looking at his watch, and he was looking at his watch. He was looking at his watch, and he was looking at his watch.
