

MRS. LEIGH'S GOVERNNESS

It was a cruel moment when Mrs. Grace Courtenay, after the change of fortune, first met her former governess...

"That, the very summer after she went to Geneva, an enterprising man kept her up a spacious hotel, directly by the water, and laid out around it some fifty acres of magnificent ground. Immediately, Severance became not only a fashionable resident in New York, but a very successful one."

"And one morning, when out for a ride with his wife and two children, he was riding along one of the country roads, in a plantation, he had a pair of handsome ponies, and a footman, milverny and cockade, with a woman in his eyes, and a horse in his hand."

"What! the daughter of the great fortune? The girl who had been the governess of the late Mrs. Leigh? It is a great sight, even for her."

"I saw you," she said, "and I was glad to see you. I had expected to see you in the next day."

"I saw you," she said, "and I was glad to see you. I had expected to see you in the next day."

"I saw you," she said, "and I was glad to see you. I had expected to see you in the next day."
